At a meeting of Session, held May 26th, 1864, the subject of Church extension was taken up, and after due deliberation it was agreed: "From the difficulty long felt of supplying sufficient church accommodation to applicants who were desirous of connecting themselves with the Congregation, and the large increase to the population which would necessarily follow the removal of the Government to this city, to bring the matter before the Presbytery at its first meeting, in order that action might be taken for establishing a Missionary Station near the centre of the city, to be entirely under the control of the Presbytery."

The Presbytery having taken action in the matter, three elders, namely, Mr. Donald Kennedy, Mr. Wm. Taylor and Mr. Wm. Hutchison, along with several members of Knox Church, volunteered to identify themselves with the movement, and aid in securing its success, and the result of this effort was the organization of Bank Street Church.
