The Russian offensive near Kirlibaba will relieve the Roumanians to some extent, for the nature of the blow is such that if it were carried out in force it would turn the entire German positions in Roumania, for by bursting thru the Carpathian barriers Brusiloff, with his Cossacks, would be in a position for swift descent against the line of the Maros, on which Von Falkenhayn is based. In this action the Russians took ridges and heights eastwards and southwards of Kirlibaba and they made 711 prisoners, indicating a consider-The aid which the British and the French are going to give Roumania is probably as direct as possible and its chief form is providing of munitions for the hastening of the advance from Salonica. It seems that originally this movement was reserved for a later stage of the war, when it would be evident that the central powers had no punch left, but since the peril to Roumania has become so great, rapid action is called for. So the Serbians are continuing to press ahead in conjunction with the allies. Their latest achievement, reported yesterday, was the carrying of several trenches. Some prisoners and a fairly large quantity of munitions were taken. The captured trenches were filled with enemy dead.
