Barlasch of the Guard

By HENRY SETON MERRIMAN

Enveloped in their stiff sheepskins, one with colorless faces turned toward the ceiling by the high collars which reached to the brim of their hats—showing nothing but eyes where the rims made old faces and young all alike, it was difficult for any to judge of their neighbor—whether he were Pole or Prussian, Dantzig or Swede. The women in thick shawls, with hooded or scarves concealing their faces, stood steadily beside their husbands. It was only the children who asked a thousand questions, and got never an answer from the cautious occupants of a Hantseatic people.

Is it the French or the Russians that are coming? asked a child near to Desiree. "Both," was the answer. "But which will come first?" "Wait and see—silently," replied the careful Dantzig, looking over his shoulder.

Desiree had changed her clothes, and wore beneath her fur dress that had been prepared for the day to Zoppo so long ago. Mathilde had noticed the dress, which had not been seen for six months. Lisa, near the door, looked at it as to a friend, when helping Desiree with her furs. "You have changed," since you last wore it.

"I have grown older—and fatter," answered Desiree, chuckling. "But the change was in the hair, not in the face." With Sebastian's permission—almost at his suggestion they had selected the Grune Bruck as the point from which to start the night. This bridge spans the Motlawa at the entrance to the Langenmarkt, and the roadway wide in front of it leads again to pass beneath the Grune Thor. There is rising ground where the road spreads like a fan, and here they could be seen by the sentries.

"Let us hope," said Sebastian, "that two of these gentlemen may prove just as they are." But he did not offer to accompany them. By half-past eleven the streets were empty. The citizens knew their Governor, it seemed. He would not keep them waiting. Although Rapp looked that power of appalling to the innocent which has survived Napoleon's death, with such a stinging vitality that it moves.

"Where are you going, comrade?" a hundred men in uniform asked him. "To seek a brother," answered Barlasch, who, like many unprincipled persons, had soon forgotten that he is much more than a name. "But the majority glanced at them stupidly, without comment, or with only a shrug of the shoulders. They were going the wrong way. They must be mad. Between Dantzig and Konigsberg some one had been having a quarrel. Seeking Warsaw—despatch-bearers seeking Warsaw—going northward to the Grune Thor, they still in front of their own comrades, a prominent member of the Tugendbund, rendering like many others, if there were others, left in the world. Others, again, told them that they were officers ordered to take up some command in the rear-guard army.

Beyond Konigsberg, however, d'Aragon and Barlasch found themselves alone on a deserted road. Every man's face was set toward the west. This was not an army at all, but an endless procession of tramps. Without food or shelter, with baggage but what they could carry on their backs, they journeyed as each of us must journey out of this world into that which lies beyond—alone, with no comrade to help them over the rough places, or lift them when they fell. For there was no one behind—alone, with no comrade to help them over the rough places, or lift them when they fell. For there was no one behind—alone, with no comrade to help them over the rough places, or lift them when they fell.

"Where are the guns?" asked one. "And the treasure of Moscow?" whispered a Jew with cunning eyes, who had hidden behind his neighbor when Rapp glanced in his direction. Emerging on the bridge, the General glanced at the old Motlawa. A crowd was collected on it. The citizens no longer used the bridge but crossed without fear where they pleased, and heavy sleighs passed up and down as on a highway. Rapp saw it, made a grimace, and, turning in his saddle, spoke to his neighbor, an engineer officer, who was making an immortal name and die in Dantzig. The Motlawa was one of the chief defenses of the city, but instead of a river the Governor found a highroad! Rapp alone seemed to look about him with the air of one who knew his whereabouts. In the straggling train of men behind him, not one in a hundred looked for a friendly face. Some stared in front of them with lifeless eyes while others, with a little spirit plucked up at the end of a weary march, glanced up at the gabled houses with the interest called forth by the first sight of a new city.
