The 104th

Private Spurgeon E. McBride of the 104th Battalion band, writing from Folkestone under date of November 1, says that the battalion was inspected a few days previous by Major-General Steele and that General Steele told the men that Lt.-Colonel Fowler had fought to keep the men together and cross to France as a unit and that he had succeeded. It is believed that the 104th may now be in France.

Ordnance Officers Here

Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

In his speech at a banquet held in the evening, Sir Wilfrid Laurier referred to the correspondence published since the resignation of Sir Sam Hughes, saying that it showed that the opposition charges had been justified. He charged further, as shown by the correspondence, that men at the front had died because of insufficient equipment not provided because of the disputes and quarrels in the government ranks and that the most sacred trust ever placed in the hands of a government had been betrayed from the start. The chieftain was given a magnificent reception by the Liberals of Ontario.
