GERMAN FEAR OF TANKS

Berlin Writer Describes Terror They Caused in the First Attack.

The following description of the terror created in the German ranks by the first appearance in action on the Western Front of the British "tanks," or armored auto war chariots, is taken from an article entitled "The Devil's Coach," written for the German press by a war correct and rench sentries "When the German trench sentries ret and reason returned again."

Withey stared and stared, like men stricks men stricken with paralysis. The monsters advanced slowly, hobbling, swaying and bobbing about but they were coming nearer. Nothing was able to stop them, they seemed to be driven ahead by a supernatural power. Then the thought fiashed through the head of some one in the trenches, "The devil is coming," and the word ran along the line like a flash of lightning.

Suddenly tongues of flame shot out of the armored backs of the iron caterpillars. Shells whistled over the men's heads and the dreadful music of a machine gun orchestra filled the air. The enigmatical being had revealed its secured again."

WHY DON'T THEY STAY?

"In writing from France some weeks ago, one of the American correspondents gove a detailed account of how the British replenish their supply of air craft on the Somme front by flying new planes across the channel from factory to field." says the January Popular Mechanics Magazine. "During favorable weather the trips are made almost daily, a dozen or more machines being driven into France, the pilots returning to England by steamer, after making the delivery, to repeat the routine the following day. The particular flight of which he writes was completed in seventeen minutes, although better time is made when the crossing is undertaken at a narrower point." patents is now about 200,000. This number includes not only those who are settled on land which was originally homesteaded, but also who have taken up their residence on railway and company lands. In making out a case for the present homestead law, as an effective agency in establishing men on the land, it could not be claimed that more than fifty per cent. of the homesteaders have become farmers. Evidently, while everything possible was being done by means of roseate promises and offers of icals, stationery, and other products, will be greater deference to manufacturing vation. It is not for lack of warning that chemists and advocates of forest consermuch of the hampering effect of the prosent stringency is falling on both the producers and the consumers. Promising experiments in the finding of substitutes for the traditional and customary basic sources of supply have been carried on in the United States at great expense. If proved feasible, these new materials for papermaking are to be had in huge quantities. But, under conditions of supply before the war, it seemed easier to go on cutting down timber than to test the worth of grasses and the stalks of plants. Now, however, there is an eagerness to get a supply, be the source ever so humble.

In all probability, attention will be paid also to the "waste" of the long-leaf pine forests of the southern states, now that the supply of pulp from northern state and Canadian forests, of spruce and poplar, comes far short of meeting the demand. An expert of highest rank, now in the service of the Canadian Pacific Railway as adviser on problems of conservation, but previously a profound student of the economic resources of the United States, estimates that, enough raw material from long-leaf pines is wasted, every day, in the southern states, to produce 40,000 tons of paper, not to mention other valuable products. Use of pulp made from this source of supply would be chiefly for the coarser grades of paper; but it would set free just so much more of the spruce and poplar supply for the higher grades. If present conditions of scarcity continue long there is bound to be resort to the southern forests, and investment there of capital in new forms of timber conversion. First there will be the collection and use of the "wastes" now left to decay or to be burned. Then will follow the Norah M. Holland, in The University change of the growing wood into pulp; and the South, with its vast resources
