THE ARCHITECT.

O famous and fine is the rare architect,
Who reeks not of labor or cost,
Whose buildings with jewels and silver are decked,
Where never a beauty is lost.
In silence works he, through the day and the night,
Nor sound of a hammer is heard.
Pagodas and palaces, gleaming with light,
Arise at his beck or his word!

In country or town, on the meadow or hill,
He chooses and uses a site.
No law doth he own but the law of his will,
And none may dare question his right.
Unwearied by time, and undaunted by foe,
Unhammered by fear or command,
He builds for all people, the high and the low,
With patient and provident hand.

The castle and cottage alike he'll adorn,
Nor meanest of things doth disdain
The peasant sleeps sweetly, and finds in the morn
A palace on his window-pane—
O famous and fine is this architect rare,
Who reeks not of labor or cost,
Who builds gorgeous mansions, and yet has to spare,
The king of all builders, Jack Frost!

—Zitella Cocke, in Youth's Companion.

A MOSLEM MISSIONARY.

The old Egyptian cemetery at Assiout is a desolate, sandy tract of land, with a desert stretching away on either hand. Each grave is furnished with double gravestones, placed as seats for the two recording angels, Munkar and Nekir. After death, say the Mohammedans, the soul stays with the body for four-and-twenty hours. During this time it is questioned by the spirits who descend, one bearing the book for the good, the other that for the evil deeds of the departed. When the answers are noted they rise, with the volumes, to the throne of Allah and, according to their contents, the soul is rewarded or punished.

The tombstones at first stand side by side, but in the loose sandy soil they soon sink and lean apart at various angles. No flowers grow there; no woman would even dream of coming to plant any there. Such as it was, however, it had a visitor in the person of an old, blind beggar. Ibrahim had not always been poor and forlorn. He had once been a prosperous dragoman wearing gorgeous apparel and earning much backsheesh by guiding English and American tourists through his native land. Now he was dependent upon the charity of those pious believers who daily distributed bread to the needy from the doors of the mosque.

Ibrahim loved the graveyard. He felt more at home there than in the town of the living outside its walls. So many of his old friends were here. They were all gone into the other world, some in battle with the Berbers or the Sudanese, some from old age, some by pestilence, some by famine, which ever waits to devour the fellah when, by chance, the Nile fails to give sustenance to his poor little strip of arable land. Only he was left of all his generation. He loved to wander from one stone to another. Occasionally he stopped to recall the past, to hold an imaginary conversation with some shade, to give some piece of news and fancy its effect upon the visionary audience. He would often go home quite cheered and refreshed by the companionship and feeling less lonely. One only, and he the dearest, was absent. Whether he lay beneath ocean waves, or under drifting Libyan sands, or in a far-off country, Ibrahim never knew; but it was his only son, his firstborn child, he whose birth had been hailed with much rejoicing. The ceremonies had been observed in due form—the household festival on the seventh day, when the sweetened water was dropped in the baby's mouth to give it a pleasant foretaste of life's gifts; the forty bowls of water poured upon his head upon the fortieth day. The lad had been put under the care of a wise fakir and carefully instructed in the faith of El-Islam; but, in spite of everything, he had proved a renegade, idle and worthless; even, it was whispered so vile as to learn from Christians to drink the forbidden fiery waters which destroy not only the body but the soul as well.

Yes, there was no doubt that he was a bad son, and, when he finally ran away with a caravan of wandering Bedawin, the bazar felt that fate had dealt kindly with Ibrahim. But he himself thought otherwise, for his soul yearned after his troublesome child; and even now, after so many long years, his works of supererogation, his observance of extra hours of prayer besides the ordained five, his visit to the Well, or tombs of saints, his offerings of ostrich eggs in the mausoleums and scraps of cloth fastened to the surrounding trees, were always performed with the hope that they might somehow benefit that son, for whose sake, when the trump of Israfil should sound, he himself would be content to fall from the razor bridge of El-Sirat into the abyss below, provided only the soul of his boy might be borne across to rest beneath the shade of trees with the houris of Paradise. To his deceased wives, nine in all, he seldom gave a thought, but, for Ali's sake, scourged his poor worn back and stood for hours in the broiling sun; for Ali he roused himself to pray at midnight. He always made one of the blind men who walked behind a bier to chant the creed while the boys followed to sing the "Hashriyeh," the poem of last judgment, and the mourning women wailed behind. And he loved to listen to the burial prayer: "O, Allah! forgive our living and forgive our dead. Pardon those who are present and those who are absent."

On the afternoon in question the old man felt more weary than usual. In his wanderings through the bazar, he had, by chance, heard of a certain stranger who lay ill at a miserable hostlery on the outskirts of the town. He had staggered, no one knew from what place, late one night in a dazed and sunstruck condition and had speedily grown too ill to make himself intelligible. He was young, and evidently a Frank of some sort; but there were none but natives in Assiout during the hot season of September, and no one to look after a sick stranger, especially as there seemed a probability that he might be suffering from cholera. So old Ibrahim felt his way into the mud hut one baking afternoon to sit by the sufferer, to give him water, and to keep away the torturing flies. From that hour he tended him continually. In his long intercourse with Anglo Saxons he had grown wise in their speech, and he knew that the wandering accents were American.

He sat patiently, through long, broiling days, not so much from compassion as from the hope that always shone before him that his good deeds might be set down to the account of his lost son. But no Christian mother could have been more faithful and tender than the ignorant, superstitious, fanatical old follower of the prophet. Love works to the same end through devious channels.

Whether from the care of Ibrahim or from his own strong constitution, the young American struggled back to life and to a long, fretful restless convalescence. He brought forth a small stock of money, enough to pay the tavern-keepers; but Ibrahim went unpaid, because, though he did not know it, the stranger was waiting until he could communicate with his consul.

It was beginning to grow cooler. After a long rest in his favorite resort Ibrahim felt refreshed, and strolled cheerfully back, receiving greetings from the neighbors as he went. "To tend the sick and stranger is to do the will of Allah," said they, approvingly; and their praises were grateful to his ears.

There was little else to reward him. His patient was not one who had learned much from life in the lessons of unselfishness and self-control. But even on him it began gradually to dawn that this oriental patience and courtesy was something surprising and beyond anything he had a right to expect.

"Ibrahim," he asked a few days later, "when you pray, what do you say?"

The old man flushed. "I speak with Allah, howadji," he answered with simple dignity.

"Oh, see here! I know you don't like to talk about your faith to unbelievers; but I'm not meaning to be impertinent. I really would like to know very much."

The old man bowed his head.

"I say many things, howadji, and different things at different hours: I recite the names of Allah, and I always repeat El Fatiha." And in a low voice he recited:

"'In the name of Allah, the Merciful and Gracious. Praise to Allah, the Lord of all creatures, the Merciful and Gracious, the Prince of the Day of Judgment! We serve thee and we pray to thee for help. Lead us in the right way of those to whom thou hast shown mercy, upon whom no wrath resteth, and who go not astray. Amen.'

"H'm!" said his hearer, as the sonorous Arabic fell upon his ears. "Now if it was in New England, we would call that a pretty good sort of prayer." And he became thoughtful.

December came in, cool and refreshing. The sick man began to get about again. He was much gentler in manner, and showed symptoms of gratitude. He had not been able to convince himself of the soundness of his own views of Ibrahim's mercenary motives. They talked much together.

"To-morrow is a great feast in my country," he remarked, as they sat and sunned themselves in front of the dom palms.

Ibrahim nodded. "Yes. I remember. It is the birth of Issa. We also honor him as a prophet, but not as you do. But often I have heard of him, and sometimes the traveling people have told me stories from your book. There was one tale," he added, wistfully, "that I would like to hear again. We have none like it. It was of a son who went away from his father, far off into a strange country, but he came back."

The other did not speak for a moment.

"The prodigal son," he said, at last. "Yes, I know it. I have a bible in my bag; I'll read it to you, if you like."

"Thanks, howadji," answered Ibrahim, gratefully. "Yes, gladly would I hear the tale again."

The young man fetched a volume out of the hut, and sat down under the shade of the palm tree. "A certain man had two sons," he began, and he read it through to the end. He looked rather strange when he finished. "What on earth made you ask for that just now?" he said.

"Howadji," answered the old man, simply, "I had a son. It was long ago. He left me one day, and I heard of him no more. The will of Allah be done."

"And you mean to say that you remember him still—that you miss him after all these years?"

"Yes, truly, howadji," said the other, in surprise. "A father does not forget his son."

"But suppose he was no credit to his father; suppose he had been wild and troublesome. Wouldn't he have worn out your patience after awhile? You might have been glad to lose track of him, and it would have been an unpleasant surprise to get him back."

"No," answered the other, impatiently; "he would still be my son. Always my heart would roam the earth seeking him; but the dead come not back."

"They do sometimes," muttered the young man.

He rose and walked up and down. "See here, Ibrahim, I've been pretty near death lately. I could easily pretend that I'd passed over the line. I feel rather like a ghost as it is. Now what's the use of a ghost coming back to vex the people who thought him safely dead? He'd much better go back and keep himself out of sight somewhere in the African forest. There's plenty of room for ghosts in there; and it isn't such a bad place."

"My son, my son," and Ibrahim rose and leaned upon his staff. His long, white beard swept his brown breast, his white hair waved beneath his green turban. He was a venerable and imposing figure. "My son, life lies before you. You have gone but a little way, and, if it was not well, yet there is time to make it right. Hear the words of an old man. Go back to your home, and to those who wait and look for you. Do good, not evil. And may Allah grant you find the way of peace."

The boy was silent a minute, and the sightless eyes could not see a certain mistiness in the other pair. "I'll do it, old man," he said, rather chokily. "I'll go back and have another try at it."

Ibrahim was an old man then, he is a very old one now. He is guarded with a certain reverence by the native population. He still wanders to the old graveyard, with feeble steps, and holds converse with the quiet inmates. The houris have rather faded from his mind, and he takes but little interest in the gardens and musk scented soil of paradise. Only he hopes that somehow, somewhere, some day, he will find his son again, and then all will be well.—Margaret S. Hall, in N.Y. Independent.
