The Foundations of Real Democracy.

BY W. W. SWANSON, PROFESSOR OF ECONOMICS, UNIVERSITY OF SASKATCHEWAN

It is obvious when one penetrates to the heart of life in its social and political aspects, that it is controlled by economic considerations. Education, social progress, political advancement—one and all depend upon the economic environment and the degree to which it has been mastered. The social life and the political power of a poverty-stricken community are not only empty, but devoid of purpose. This, it strikes us, is perhaps the greatest failure of the Church to-day—that it does not recognize that moral values cannot color and sustain the life of a people so poor in material possessions that they can not raise themselves above the drab and dreary business of merely making a living. Leaving the full discussion of this question for later consideration, we may merely remark here that, during the past two or three years, a veritable social revolution has been provoked among the masses of Canada by the raised standard of living to which they have attained.

This is true of almost all classes, but especially of the agricultural community, which at last is emerging from the economic wilderness and coming into its own. Through their organizations the farmers of the West proclaim that they are no longer satisfied with being mere hewers of wood and drawers of water. Everything depends upon that changed and more vivid conception of life. Economic conditions that have held the agricultural community back are slowly but remorselessly, one by one, falling before their onslaught. There are economic and social victories no less fundamental and far-reaching in their ultimate effects, than those won upon the blood-soaked fields of France. During the crisis of war, when every effort is exerted to overcome autocracy and tyranny in Europe, let it not be forgotten that the pent up energies let loose to vanquish autocracy at home, and to widen the bounds of political and economic justice, are of scarcely less significance.

It is a truism to state that the farmers of Canada, as well as of the United States, have hitherto not made their weight and will count sufficiently in the national life. They have been content, as though mesmerized, to accept the dictum that what is needed at Ottawa and Washington is a "business" government. That has practically meant a lawyers' government. Behind these legislators have stood the business interests, for whom the lawyers spoke. This has been true of our political life whichever party happened to be in power. If the management of the economic and social life of Canada and the United States, and its advancement, is the outcome of a "business" administration, then it is high time that the plain people had something to say about it. The agricultural community, it is usually supposed, can provide neither the leadership nor the intelligence to manage affairs on a big scale. Nevertheless we make bold to say that, in the great farmers' organizations of the prairie provinces there is at least as fine leadership and as splendid organizing ability shown as have been displayed anywhere else within the nation. More than that, a legislature such as that of Saskatchewan composed almost entirely of farmers, need not take a second place to any other legislative body on the continent. This irrespective of any reference to partyism or party politics.

To those with eyes to see, it is plain as daylight that old party cries, and the old type of party leadership, are mildewed and quite worn out. The catchwords and the slogans that did duty in the past give forth a hollow sound. They do not ring true. The new democracy bursting the filaments that formerly bound it, is emerging into a new and vigorous life. Let us not be misunderstood; we do not assert that there is any shadow of possibility of an outbreak of Bolshevism in the Dominion. The plain people of Canada are too sound at heart for that. What we do say is that the masses are making a searching analysis of what blind loyalty to the shibboleths, that did duty for intelligent
