

the small stream wound through a meadow, shaded by trees, and there were beautiful flowers and ferns growing on the banks, and here and there a fruit tree bent its branches so low over the water that the fruit was within easy reach.

"Dorothy was so intently watching the silver spray of a fountain that sprang up among the moss and wild roses, that she did not notice she had turned her boat, she did not mean to turn it, but the little boat was so easily moved and the stream so shaded, one hardly noticed the turn. But very soon the pleasant stream changed and ran in quite a different direction from the broad, straight river.

"I don't think Dorothy even knew that the river had divided, or that the beautiful dove had beaten its wings as if sorry when the boat turned, and now kept fluttering over and around as if to try to make her see it, and when she did not, look so sadly down on her. Since turning into the pleasant winding stream she did not notice the dove as she had done before, and I was afraid it would leave the boat and Dorothy.

"As she gathered her arms full of large red flowers and ate of the tempting fruit, she forgot to guide her boat. I could see the lovely dove far above her, with out-stretched wings, looking sadly down on her, as if it so sorry Dorothy had forgotten even to look for it. I could see her white dress with red flowers fastened on it, and I could hear her laughing, but I do not think she was happy.

"Some green and yellow birds were singing gaily on a tree that was laden with red apples. Dorothy reached up to pick some, and was calling out to the bright birds, when oh, as she stood with up-stretched arms, not even looking to see where her boat was going, there came a dreadful crash. I heard a cry of pain and fear, and saw Dorothy fall for the boat had run against a rock with such force it nearly tipped over. I am sure it would have done so but for the dove, who flew on the bow and with its outspread wings steadied it.

"Dorothy had been thrown on her face in the bottom of the boat, where she lay stunned for a moment; when she slowly raised herself I saw she was bruised, and her white clothes were sadly stained and soiled with the fruit and flowers.
