roted services in the cause of religion and country. Long may they continue to fill and adorn the Curial chairs in the hall of the Venerables.

It was to foster religion and science, to develop what is best in human nature, and to sublimate it by supplying supernatural aid to its weakness, as well as supernatural motives for its exercise, that St. Dunstan's was instituted. It was designed to send forth, in continuous succession, young men fitted to leave society with the priceless ferment of lofty aspiration, honest endeavor, and correct principles of action in private and public life. They were not to form a class apart, except inasmuch as the nobility of their conduct should distinguish them from others. They would owe duties to the world, service to mankind, and, above all, reverence to God and His holy laws. Truly, wisdom presided at the founding of our Alma Mater. Has wisdom been justified in her children? Is the serious question we should propose to ourselves to-day for thoughtful consideration. Have we, the Alumni of St. Dunstan's, come up to the legitimate expectation of it founder and his supporters? If not, why not? Whose has been the fault? Whose the ruthless hand that has cast down the noble ideal of college training and college dreams, and set up in its stead the disfigured ideal of selfish material success, or of debasing vice? We cannot turn back the hands on the dial of time, and live over the years that have dropped forever into the past; but we can, what yet is left, light, turn aside from dangerous paths, regain the royal road of duty, and offer repentant worship at the shrine of our early ideals. If the past has had its failures, let us learn to make stepping-stones of them to success; if perverted views of life, its objects and its uses, have led to disorders, let us correct them by the touchstones of Eternal Wisdom, crying out, "What dost it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

Friends, and fellow Alumni, I regret that one more eloquent had not been chosen to address you on this occasion. Whilst very many could have done ample justice to the theme, few, I dare venture to say, could have approached it with a deeper sense of the honor and responsibility, or with a greater love and veneration for our Alma Mater. My purpose has been to set her before you, as a benign mother deserving of the love and gratitude of her children, so that there may be in your souls an abiding thought of her, which should be an influence for good, and an incentive for deeds worthy of educated men. I know you all will wish, and I pray that St. Dunstan's may wax stronger and more potent for good as years roll by, that she may flourish as a palm planted by running waters, and that her Alumni may ever be men of valiant purpose and virtuous enterprise.

In addition to those priests whose names have already been mentioned, most of the diocesan clergy were in attendance.
