Municipal Expenses Increase Faster Than Does Population

Dr. Horace L. Brittain of Citizens' Research Committee Gives Explanation of Interesting Fact.

What do increasing municipal expenses. One is the taking on of new functions, usually as a result of insistent popular demand. Another is the extension of old services at a greater rate than increase in population. In practically all Canadian cities, Dr. Brittain says, municipal expenses are increasing faster than population. But expansions of municipal functions and improved administration of old activities must be considered as a cause for this.

"It is not necessary to believe that the world has gone insane, and that this insanity is alone responsible for the great increase in municipal expenses. One is the taking on of new functions, usually as a result of insistent popular demand. Another is the extension of old services at a greater rate than increase in population. The increase of wages and prices are also elements that greatly added to cost of civic government."

As shown in Toronto, assessment per capita increase of sixteen cities in Ontario, Dr. Brittain shows that only one city on the list larger than London has a smaller per capita, and only three smaller cities have a larger per capita.
