Balfe's "Bohemian Girl" Worthily Ren

traction being Balfe's beautiful and ever favorite "Behemian Girl," of which, in like the bread and butter of childhood, one never tires. The airs into which the composer breathed his soul, and which rendered him immortal; which have thrilled and inspired generations of delighted listeners, were sung last night with splendid effect by the competent artists of the company.

Miss Carrington's "Arline" was as nearly perfect as one could desire, her singing of "I Dreamt I Dwelt in Marble Halls" being especially pleasing. Miss Tannerhill, as the "Gipsy Queen," sang her numbers and acted a difficult part with her usual conscientious care and ability. Harry Davies, as "Thaddeus," scored a great hit by his rendition of "When Other Lips," while his work all through was well up to his usual high standard. Edward Eagelton made a capital "Devilshoof," giving another example of his versatility. Robert Dunbar, who was suffering from a severe cold, sang under difficulties as "Count von Arnheim"—his disability being the only regretable factor in the evening's performance. The minor char-

When Capt. Butler sent in his report to Donald A. Smith, Lord Strathcona, Edmonton was practically out of the world, and a journey to that remote region was attended with many hardships and privations, but now one can go in a palace car to the very scene of the gold diggings. Men who are familiar with that country feel assured that great quartz veins will yet be discovered somewhere in the mountain fastnesses west of Edmonton. They rightly argue that the gold must come from somewhere, that it did not grow. It is a country well worth looking over, and if dedging operations can be carried on successfully in a small way, an enterprise of greater magnitude must show good results.
