SARMATIAN From Portland Dec. 22.

From the Detroit Free Press.

"Yes, sir, raw beef is good for your black eye—best thing you can use," said the butcher as he proceeded to cut a thick and a kind note from the princess, saying that she was happy to comply wish my request.

Tennyson's autograph was my next desideratum. It came to me unexpectedly, but not until I had wasted much link and paper in appealing to the laureate himself. I wrote to the late Duke of Wellington—saltitle man with a big heart, who wore cotton gloves and invariably rode on the top of an omnibus—asking for a few words or lines in the handwriting of the hero of Waterloo. He sent me whock, yellow and musty, which had been filled in by the Iron Duke, and, to my unuterable joy, he enclosed a batch of letters, hoping, as he playefully put it, that they would be worth a place in my album. The batch of letters consisted of one from Tennyson, another from Queen Viotoria, and one in the legible, though somewhat boylsh, hand-writing of Albert Edward, Prince of Wales.

There were others from smaller fry, but this trie did indeed form a place in my album, and, as I am a conservative, they occupy a prominent position.

Lord Beaconsfield was another un-getata-the individual. His secretary would respond to your first application, saying that his lordship never gave his autograph to anybody. It was useless to impress upon Beaconsfield that his was the only autograph necessary to make your collector of modern celebrities complete. You might wait long and anxiously for a rejoinder, but you would write, expressing regret for having trespassed so much on his valuable time, and, if you were rash, you would spend 25 or 50 cents on an elegant photograph, and urge him just to affix his signature thereto and return it. He would do neither, and any further portraits you might send him would be gone from your gaze forever.

But I got his autograph nevertheless. My brother came across an impecunious man who had, in his heyday, spens some a place in my beginned to the saloon on an elegant photo.

My brother came across an impecunious man who had, in his heyday, spent some months of his existence in writing a laudatory poem on the royal family, and who had ventured to submit the proof sheets to Beaconsfield. "I finished the proofs this evening, and bave read them with transcendent interest," wrote Beaconsfield in seply. A small sum purchased this letter for me, and I was made the happy possesor of Beaconsfield's autograph.

Charles Darwin would rarely respond to an application for his autograph, but when I wrote, asking for an elucidation of what to me was a complex portion of his "Origin of Species," he was prompt in replying. His caligraphy was wretched, and I felt like asking him to explain his explanation. An initial letter, a dash of the pen, and a final letter were made to represent a word. His reply could only be understood by guess work and the aid of a powerful microscope. To Prof. Tyndall dinner at his grandfather's. To Prof. Tyndall and Prof. Huxley I wrote, asking their opinion with regard to a theory which had been put forth by a scientist named Harrington, that the sun was not a source of heat or light to the solar system. Huxley, I verily believe, esteemed me a lunatic, but, although his reply was curt, it gave me his autograph. Tyndall wrote at some length, saying that he had heard of Mr. Harrington's theory, but Mr. Harrington's ideas were not his, and he would advise me to pause before making them my own.

Probably no man is so much importuned as Mr. Gladstone, and, unlike Beaconsfield, he will, when out of office, send a personal answor to almost every communication he receives, and, if by chance a request for his autograph should be unsuccessful, one has only to mention some current political topic to open the floodgates of his eloquence and draw from him a torrent of closely written sentences.

Rose Cleveland, the president's mister, was the first to catch the fever, and from this lady the contagion has spread until nearly every city and town in the country has a large number of well developed cases. Why, last week a woman bout 48 years old came here and threw herself into one of the chairs like a three-times-a-week shaver. Did she want her hair cut? Well, I should hurry to reply she did. I run the shears around and up and down the back of her cranium until I found some wrinkles back of her ears, and then I stopped. In a modest sort of way I told her of my discovery, and recommended a mixture I have for removing the furrows of time. Why, sir, that woman was so bumiliated that she left orders to have her tresses made into a wig and switch, and only yesterday I saw this lady promenading on State street with her hair fastened on with pine, nets and strings. Let me about 48 years old came here and threw on with pins, nets and strings. Let me tell you of another funny case over on the west side. I was a long time getting a letter from Mr. Ruskin, but it came at last. For some reason which, I can't now explain, I asked his opinion as to what were the best theological works for a young member of the Church of England to improve her mind with. His reply was this:

"I have no time to write you at any length, and I take no interest in any young ladies who study theology."
