

nation. Here I should like to pay tribute to the contributions which many private and semi-private organizations have made to this public education, and also to their accomplishments in resource planning itself.

Resource management, then, does call for careful thought and planning. It calls for this, however, not in any one place and by one agency dealing with it as a single problem. Instead it calls for action by the provinces to carry out their responsibility for resource management as such. It calls for action by the Federal Government in the many fields to which I have referred. And it calls for foresight and wise management by private enterprise in its field of efficient and economic development.

It is in this sense and in this way that we can effectively plan and act for the best use of the great resources that are at the disposal of the Canadian people.
