A Winter Night.

Extract from "Canadian Seasons," by William H. Taylor.

No one has thrilled with unalloyed delight. Who has not viewed some star-lit winter night, The glory of the Universal Soul, On infinite expanse, pervade the Whole. No other season of the year can we As Atoms feel the radiate majesty Of that great Cause, which crystallized the snow, And made those countless billion suns to glow. Young Luna's golden crescent sinks to rest, All edged with liquid silver in the west; Those constellations vast, inspire with awe The finite Student, reading Higher Law, And his bewildered mind in sheer despair Kens not, but feels the Soul of Deus there,

No sound of life disturbs, from near or far, A failing feather would the stillness jar; The calm is perfect, and the thought—"Alone"— Prostrates the Ego, as he views the Throne. Who knows but some inhabitant of yonder star, With keener sight, can fathom what we are; With more intelligence from his high tower, Can view the Motor of Eternal Power? Those glittering orbs were never made in vain, And may be schools where we may go again, With those who went before. We may be part Of deathless Soul, in that vast starry chart. Who can deny that Trees of Knowledge grow On those bright worlds, where flesh may never go? But where our loved ones are, up higher, higher, Who eat the fruit and touch the seraph's lyre.

The road to madness leads towards that line Where systems like the dust forever shine. In that blue-black, unfathomed, concave deep, Which has no night, no day, no end, no sleep. Dismiss these thoughts, let Beauty be our theme. Not Oberon, the King, in Shakspere's dream, Nor Queen Titania's fairy necromancy. Could conjure such a stage in realms of Fancy; No mermaid in her cave had gems so rare As Zero gives to spirits of the air. Or trod prismatic sapphires such as glow On this bespangled field of crystal snow; They lend the boughs of spruce a magic light, And strew their diamonds on the skirts of night.

Is this the very same, this magic place, That was the theatre of that wild race. Who bore the name of Genii, Elives, or Sprites And fitted madly here long summer nights? Has Death Eternal claimed the lonely shore Of this cold lake, and shall we nevermore Behold the firefly's tiny flashing lamp, Along the marshes, then so warm and damp? The grosser life has only gone to sleep, The. Spirits now their subtler vigils keep. Their wireless messages they send afar, And tell us caterpillars what we are. See that grand are display its waving arms, No earthly vision shows such awful charms As from Aurora Borealis roll In pyrotechnic glory from the Pole,

Hark! there's the bells upon the trotting mare Of Doctor Good, which shocks the frigid air; His midnight visit to the house of pain Was labor lost—he hurries home again: His patient mounted on the wings of light, And joined the starry hosts this winter night.
