CHAPTER XXIX

Suspicious Answers

Beth and Van rode away from the claim just after lunch, she on a borrowed horse. The girl had not slept, but she had rested well and was far more fit for the journey back to town than either she or Van had expected.

He went with her part way only—far enough to put her safely on a trail from which she could not wander. They talked but little as they rode—perhaps because they had so much to say that could not be approached. Never for a moment did Van relax his vigilance upon himself, treat her otherwise than as a man for whom he had conceived a natural liking. When they came to the place of parting he pulled up his broncho and faced about in the trail.

"Well, Kent," he said, "so long. You'll have no trouble now." He held forth his hand.

Beth gave him hers—and all her heart. Nevertheless, his clasp was so brief as he would give to one of his sex.

"So long," she answered. "Good luck. I am under many obligations."

"They won't make you very round looking," he said. "See you again."

That was their parting. He rode back at once—and Beth continued on her way. She turned three times in her saddle to watch him as he went, but she did not catch him glancing back.

About sundown she rode into Goldie's camp at once to Mrs. Dick's, and tied her horse to a post. Mrs. Dick met her in the hall.

"Snakes alive!" exclaimed that lively little person. "If you ain't back as natural as life!" The girl had not deceived her for a moment. "Where in the world have you been, in such a rig?"

Beth's answer was ready.

"Talk to me about the desert," he had to spend the night on the desert."

Mrs. Dick stared at her.

"Talk to me about the Eastern women being moulted!" she said. "Don't mean his cabin was blown down by the storm?"

Beth was ill-prepared for this, but she met it.

"I wish you could have seen that roof go!"

"Are you hungry?" the hostess demanded. "You look all worn out."

"I am," Beth admitted. "Has Mr. Bostwick been here in my absence?"

"He ain't been here in anything—nope."

Beth's relief was inexpressible. She was safe, with everything behind her! No one knew, or would ever need to know, the secret in possession of herself and Van.

"If anyone comes that you can send, will you kindly have my horse taken over to the stable," she said. "I must go upstairs and rest."

Fashion Hint for Times Readers

WHITE MOHAIR SUIT FOR COACHING WEAR

The day of the coaching parade early in May was so bright and pleasant that many harnessed coaches were in evidence. A woman on the box seat of one of the coaches wore this smart little suit of snow white mohair, accompanied by a big black hat brightened by a touch of deep blue and silver Persian embroidery. The suit, as will be observed, has a modified Russian blouse which is held in to the figure by an arrangement of cords passing under the arms and across the chest. White broad trimming and white satin buttons make the little coat rather dressy, but the skirt is a perfectly plain killed model.

A Delightful Hair Dressing That Makes Hair Grow

There is a reason for the phenomenal sale of Parisian Sage in the Dominion since it was first introduced into Canada. And the reason is plain to all: Parisian Sage does just what it is advertised to do. It is guaranteed to cure dandruff, stop falling hair or itching scalp in two weeks or money back.

There is no reason whatever why any man or woman should fail to take advantage of the above generous offer.

But one thing that has made Parisian Sage so famous is its peculiar power to turn the harsh, unattractive hair that many women possess into luxuriant and radiant hair in a short time. Women of refinement the country over are using it and it never disappoints. Read this letter:

"I procured Parisian Sage and found that it was a great hair tonic and cleanser. I have used other preparations, but Parisian Sage cleaned the scalp, stopped all irritation, made my hair fluffy, silky,

"You left him well? He was feeling strong and well?"

"Never better," he assured her. "You can see what this wonderful sunlight does, even to me."

"Yes, I see. And you left Starlight yesterday?"

"Yesterday afternoon. I had trouble running back. Otherwise we'd have been here in the evening."

She glanced at him quickly. "We? Glen didn't come along? He isn't here?"

"Oh, no, no, certainly not," he hastened to say. "I brought in a man who—who is interested in the purchase we have made."

That served to arouse her sense of wonderment at what he had really been doing with her money. He was attempting to deceive her concerning Glen, and perhaps his entire story was a fabrication.

"Oh," she said. "Then you have purchased the mine—you and Glen?"

"Well—a few minor details remain to be concluded," he said off-handedly.

He was not yet in actual possession of the property. There will be no further hitch, however—and the claim is certainly Per the life of her she could get "sell what lay at the bottom of the business. The strange conflicts and discrepancies between Glen's very own letters made the matter utterly obscure. She felt that Searle was fashioning falsehoods in every direction. That he had not visited Glen at all was her fixed conviction. A sudden distrust, almost a loathing for this heavy-browed man, was settling down upon her inescapably. Somewhere, somehow she must know about Glen for herself. Her own attempted trip to Starlight had discovered all thought of further adventure, and no reliance whatsoever could be placed on Searle's reports. Perhaps the reputed mining property was likewise a myth—the one he had written to Searle.

She said: "Where is this mine that Glen has found?"

He colored slightly. "We have all agreed not to talk too much about it yet. It's not very far from here—I can tell you that. Precautions are necessary where a hundred men follow every prospector about night and day, if he happens to have found a bit of valuable ore. A thousand men would be after this property if they knew the way to secure it."

Perhaps, after all, Glen had purposely concealed this matter from herself. Bostwick sounded plausible. Her mind reverted to her brother's illness, for Glen to her was of far more importance than all the mines in Nevada.

"He colored slightly. 'We have all agreed not to talk too much about it yet. It's not very far from here—I can tell you that. Precautions are necessary where a hundred men follow every prospector about night and day, if he happens to have found a bit of valuable ore. A thousand men would be after this property if they knew the way to secure it.'

"Lord! I wouldn't tell him if a rat was dead in his pocket!" Mrs. Dick expostulated. "I can't abide the man, and you might as well know it, even if it does hurt your feelings."

Beth sat down to her breakfast. "You're as good as you can be."

"Well, well, Beth," he said as he came inside the dining-room, "I'm back, you see, but I've certainly had a time of it! The car broke down, and Glen had left Starlight when at last I arrived, and I hunted for him all through the mountains and only found him four days ago, and we've been going ever since. I couldn't write, but I did feel cut up, I assure you, about leaving you here alone for so long a time."

He advanced as if to kiss her, but Beth avoided his caress. She was calm and poised. She meant to ascertain just how far the man was trying to deceive her.

"Won't you sit down, and tell me all about it," she said. "You saw Glen four days ago?" She resumed her place in her chair.

"Three or four days ago—I'm mixed in my dates," he said, as he also took a seat. "He's looking fine, and sent his love, of course."

That the man was lying, in every particular, she began to feel convinced.

"And left no trace of stickiness as some other hair tonics had," Mrs. Sarah Sanderson wrote to Washington St., Oresco, Mich., Jan. 22, 1909.
