The balmy flowers, the balmy flowers, So glorious and so fair.
That graced the woods of boyhood's home.
Where are they, tell me where?
They pass'd away when winter came.
The rose and the too. The rose and lily too; And there is not a leaf to tell The spot where once they grew

The gentle streams, the gentle streams,
Oh! do they murmur still?
For yet my heart delights to hear
The music of a rill. The music of a rin.
The waters flow by many a bank,
As they have done before;
But, ah! their voice is not the same To me as 'twas of yore.

The birds of spring, the birds of spring, With rapture in their lay; Do they rejoice on ev'ry bough, And sing on ev'ry spray?
Alas! that song is silent now.
The light of wing have fled;
Perchance to lauds of fairer hue,
It may be to the dead!

The friends of youth, the friends of youth,
The gay and glad in mind;
Are they the same that roved in bliss,
Like perfume on the wind? Oh! one is in a distant grave, And one beneath the sea; Far o'er the wilderness of life, The rest are gone from me.

The blue-eyed maid, the blue-eyed maid, Whose smile to me was heaven; Is sainted glory in her look, Is rapture to her given ? An angel roaming through the earth Did take her to the skies; For, oh! he thought the fittest clime For her was Paradise.

They all are pass'd, they all are pass'd,
And I am left alone,
Like some memorial of the dead, To tell of what is gone;
But when the night of death shall steal Like dreams upon my way, I'll slumber till the gloom of time Be lost in endless day.

THE ASH OF PLANTS. [Condensed from a very valuable and elaborate article in "Morton's Cyclopedia of Agriculture," now publishing by Messrs. Blackie & Son, Glasgow.]

When ordinary wood, or coal, or any plant is forming the wood or coal have taken from the soil, and retained within themselves. In fact, they portant constituents of the plant could not be pro-duzed, and on their presence depends much of the value of a soil or a manure for the growth of crops The composition and also the quantity of ashes is very variable, according to the kind of plants from which they have been derived; but, within small limits, they are constant for the same kind of crops. It does, indeed, sometimes happen, that one ingredient is substituted for another; but in such cases the new substance, has fore much if. such cases the new substance has very much the same chemical characters and properties as that which it replaces.

The particular quantities of mineral food which the different kinds of plants draw from the soil, are ascertained by the analysis of their ashes; but it would be of little practical value, if analysis but it would be of little practical value, if analysis only gave the composition of the ashes of the whole plant; because different parts of that plant are very differently composed in that respect—
Thus, for instance, the tuber of the potato contains in its ashes as much as eighty-six parts in the hundred of the salts of potash and soda, while the herb contains only four parts of the same basis.

Again: suppose the farmer has removed twenty tons of turnips from an acre of his land, and destrate to ascertain the quantity of mineral food they had abstracted from the soil, the simplest calculation enables him to arrive at the result. Twenty tons are equal to 44,800 lbs.; now, as a hundred parts or pounds of turnips contain 0.66 of ash, by one analysis; 44,800 lbs. must contain, in round numbers, 295 lbs. of ash. The larger properties of wheat consists of alkalies, there being the suppose of all ow prices, and take in exchange all kinds of Country Produce,—viz.

These analyses confirm the notion of our fathers that a crop of barley or bear was easier on the land than one of oats. They also enable the farmer, at a glance, to see what he must restore of inor-ganic materia to the land, in order to keep up its fertility. Of course, as the straw draws from the land by far the larger proportion of the inorganic material, those who are in the habit of restoring a great part of it saturated with urine, as a consti-tuent of their furm-yard dung, will require a much less quantity of inorganic manure than those who sell it off the land, or even consume it all as food. And, as to the urine, our op nion's, that the most valuable form in which it can be applied as a ma-nure, is when absorbed in straw, chaff, and whatever debris the homestead affords; our great aim, in our own practice, is never to allow the liquid, in any other shape, to pass the byre-door. A great object with the farmer should be, by all means in his power, to increase the bulk, as well as the quality of his cereal crops; for, in connection with abundant green crops, this will insure abundance of the best manure, while a starved soil perpetu-

SCOTTISH FETE AT LONDON.

The grand annual competition for championship in archery and the Scottish national sports and pastimes, took place on Monday, in Lord Holland's Park, Notting Hill, under the joint direction of the Highland Society, of which his Royal Highness

Among the numerous company present, we observed the Marquis of Breadalbane, the Earl and Countess of Wilton and family, Lord Lilford, Lord Holland, Lady Lovat, and the Hon. Miss Frazer, and the Master of Lovat; the Cluny Macpherson of Cluny; Sir J. Mackenzie of Scatwell; Sir E. Mackenzie with the Firm of Messrs. HIGGINSON, of Kilcoy; Keith Stewart of Seaforth; Ro. There were two foot races, in the first of which Forbes, Gow, and Notman, were the winners; and in the second, D. M'Crae, W. Connachie, and W. Kennedy. Interspersed with these games were dancing and broadsword and bayonet execise. The style of two or three of the men who danced was thoroughly characteristic, and it was quite remarkable how accurately the spectators picked out and showed their predilection for those performers whose step and bearing seemed " native and to the manner born." One lad named G. Forbes Notman, danced the Highland fling with such admirable spirit and grace that the judges have determined to give him one of the prizes offered by her Majesty, when she visited Holland Park on Monday.

At half-past seven o'clock, a banquet took place in the Freemasons' Tavern, as an appropriate close to the proceedings of the feie; and for the distribution of the prizes. The Chair was filled by Sir Evan M'Kenzie of Kilcoy, who discharged its duties with great good taste, and in giving the toast of "Prosperity to the Scottish Fete," counselled all concerned in it to unanimity of feeling and harmonious action.

A London correspodent says-"I am sure it will be very gratifying to many of your readers to be informed that the first prize (£8), for playing Strathspeys and reels on the violin, was gained by Mr. W.
