

THE DEATH OF ELLEN MATTOCK.
 The principal thing which she had to fear was the coming of her husband, and this was in point of fact the danger which she had most difficulty in averting. As was natural enough, Mr. Langton had an inclination to pay them a visit in their Continental residence, but inasmuch as this would have utterly frustrated the whole business, she put forth every effort to prevent it, representing to him how needless it was to lose the time and incur the expense. Annabel was not improving much she wrote, but nothing was being left undone to effect her restoration, and were he on the spot he could not possibly add anything to the care or solicitude with which she was being treated.

Had Mr. Langton been less perplexed and harassed with business matters he would have disregarded these earnest dissuasions—dissuasions so earnestly offered as to amount to positive prohibitions—and would in spite of them all have journeyed to the Continent; but, alas for the safety of the innocent, his business affairs were causing him more anxiety than ever, and so occupying and absorbing him that he was glad to receive Mrs. Langton's assurances that he need not come. Thus circumstances wrought in her favour in this critical direction, and as she managed to secure the doing of all the correspondence, she wrought the matter as regarded her husband on the one hand and Annabel on the other in such a way that no direct communication passed between them, and yet so as that no suspicion was raised in either of their minds that they were being deceived and played upon.

Of course, letters had ere this come from Philip Weston, apprising them of the arrival of Jim Poole and himself in America, and detailing the efforts they were making to discover Jerry Just, Philip wrote to have seen York, who had proved to be a very disingenuous fellow, and who had rather tried to prevent them from learning anything of the man they were in search of, and had, with the view, made statements which they had found were absolutely false and misleading. By a piece of singular good luck, however, they had received authentic intelligence from another quarter, and had found that Jerry had gone away to a far distant part of the interior of the vast American continent, where they were about to depart in search of him. The journey would be a long and arduous one—very dangerous also, Philip might have added, but he was careful not to alarm them by saying a word of this—and it might be months ere they heard from him again; but he promised to write—whenever an opportunity for the conveyance of a letter could be had—under cover to the agent at Montreal, and he requested that their letters to him should also go through this medium.

Mr. Langton despatched these letters from Philip to France, and his wife, after careful consideration, put them into Annabel's hand. But she took care that the reply which Annabel wrote should not be put into the Post Office. She could not, of course, hinder Mr. Langton from writing to Philip; but, inasmuch as he could give him only such news of Annabel as she felt it desirable Philip should receive, she was under no apprehension in this respect. And Mr. Langton unwittingly assisted his wife in her evil design by giving Philip information of Annabel's poor state of health, and where Mrs. Langton had taken her for change of scene and mildness of climate. In fact, the report he sent was but a repetition of that which he himself received from France, and Philip was thus deceived without any trouble on the part of the author of the dark and iniquitous plot.
