London, Jan. 24.-The demand for new versions of the Scriptures appears to be almost insatiable. At a time when one new version alone, "The Twentieth Century," is stated to have attained the enormous sale of 200,000 copies, yet another entirely new version has been completed, and preparations are in progress for its early publication on both sides of the Atlantic. He does not really know how to extricate himself from it. The unreasonable idea has been put forward to put an end to everything by a general amnesty, of which the informers, just like those convicted by the high court of justice, would reap the benefit. But this plan is inapplicable, for only crimes and misdemeanors can come under an amnesty decree, and the drawing up of secret information notes is neither crime nor misdemeanor. This project has by its considerate rashness only elicited a contemptuous telegram from Paul Deroulede, who is in exile in Spain, declaring that the Government need not trouble itself about him. Here also is the case of Gen. Plague, who loudly demands relief from the responsibility he incurred by the letter he addressed to the Grand Orient, thanking the society for information relating to the officers which was supplied by it to the general commanding the army corps of Tours. It is announced that several other generals are likely to be implicated in the same scandal, from all of which the enemies of the republic hope to draw still further party gain. Lastly, to these military difficulties must be added new religious difficulties.
