The evidence collected tends to show that George, who was inclined to be wayward, and who was regarded as irresponsible mentally, administered poison to his father on two occasions. The father died on July 24. Two weeks later George is believed to have made a successful attempt to take the life of Charles, his 10 year-old brother, who died on Aug. 9. Inside of two weeks, and on the very Sunday before George himself was stricken down, his mother was taken with the same symptoms that had been noted at the commencement of the illness of the father and son. Mrs. Peck, from some inexplicable and son. Mrs. Peck, from some ine and son. Mrs. Peck, from some inexplicable cause as far as she was concerned, had a fit of vomiting; fearful of the consequences she sent at once for Dr. Axtell, who prescribed for her, and inside of two days she was better. About two weeks afterward, when public attention had been called to the two deaths and Mrs. Peck's similar attack, George succumbed to these same symptoms and died in the same manner as his father and younger brother. It is believed that despondency, with perhaps the fear of exdespondency, with perhaps the fear of exposure of the cause of the death of the other
