The intent of good laws is to oppose this effort, and condidiffuse their influence universally and equally." and should be their influence white fally and equally." and should be their influence white and a sould be their influence white and a sould be the sould be

Divine

of his

u and

ntages

ment.

bjects

King's

ghting

those

ceding

abule

m you

which

pected

temper

mpacts

under

y been

brth of

cd to,

fome

effors.

rt the

reduce

nifery.

RULERS, stimulated by this pernicious "effort," and subjects, animated by the just "intence of opposing good laws against it," have occasioned that vast variety of events, that fill the histories of so many nations. All these histories demonstrate the truth of this simple position, that to live by the will of one man, or sett of men, is the production of misery to all men.

On the folid foundation of this principle, Englishmen reared up the fabrick of their constitution with such a strength, as for ages to defy time, tyranny, treachery, internal and foreign wars. And, as an illustrious author of your nation, hereafter mentioned, observes,—"They gave the people of their Colonies the form of their own government, and this government carrying prosperity along with it, they have grown great nations in the forests they were sent to inhabit."

In this form, the first grand right is, that of the people having a share in their own government, by their representatives, chosen of themselves, and in consequence of being rule, by laws which they themselves approve, not by edits of men over whom they have no controus. This is a bulwark surrounding and defending their property, which by their honest cares and labours they have acquired, so that no portions of it can legally be taken from them, but with their own ^{*} Montesquieu.