[9]

1

2

e

;

1

y

-

)

r

1

f

S

ł

, ) 1

ł

t

ments of Philip. The Evil became certain, not barely contingent:

NEVERTHELESS her Conduct is blameable in many Refpects; and in none more apparently than in the Indolence and Supinenefs, generated by that oftentatious Self-confidence, which made her imagine, that the Name of Athens carried Victory to the Side the embraced. But Philip instructed her otherwife. and was found equally capable of fubduing by War as by Policy. This Monarch, with the most extensive Views of universal Dominion, had a Head as fit to defign as his Heart was willing to execute; his Accomplifhments, naturally prodigious, were improved by the most arduous and intense Application; his Courage in War, and his Conftancy in purfuing his Aim, were remarkable; his unwearied Care, his refined Policy, and his encreasing Power, made him formidable to the most distant, and courted by his neighbouring Powers. But his Heart was as dark and deceitful, as his Words feemed fair and open; his private Interest was preferred to the most folemn Treaties; no Oaths, no Engagements could bind, where an Evalion offered a temporal Advantage. Such is Philip reprefented by Historians; and in the Course of