Requiescat in Pace

To-day, with all that pomp and splendor befitting the obsequies of a great King, the mortal remains of our late Monarch will be laid at rest, and so the time has come for us to pay our last, sad tribute to his name.

The passing centuries have seen the throne of England occupied by many sovereigns to whom history has accorded splendid honors, but no title can convey a deeper meaning than that which popular opinion has granted to him whose earnest efforts and deep-felt influence in the capitals of the world have had such results that he is called "Edward, the Peacemaker."

He was the first British ruler whose coronation recognized "the British Dominions beyond the Seas," so that he, more than any who had preceded him, was "Canada's King."

An Empire mourns; an Empire so vast that somewhere on its wide expanse the sun is ever shining; but nowhere is the Nation's grief more keen than in our own Dominion.

There can be no better thing to recall, in remembering the glory of the life that is ended, than our dead King's last Kingly words "Well, it is all over, but I think I have done my duty."
