FAMOUS GEMS OF PROSE

IN HIS OWN DEFENCE By Andrew Hofer

From a speech which preceded his execution, by order of Napoleon Bonaparte, at Mantua, Italy, February 20, 1810.

TOU ask what I have to say in my defence,-you who glory in the name of France, who wander through the world to enrich and exalt the land of your birth,—you demand how I could dare to arm myself against the invaders of my native rocks? Do you confine the love of home to yourselves? Do you punish in others the actions which you dignify and reward among yourselves? Those stars which glitter on your breasts, do they hang there as a recompense for patient servitude?

I see the smile of contempt which curls your lips. You say: this brute,—he is a ruffian, a beggar! That patched jacket, that ragged cap, that rusty belt:—Shall barbarians such as he close the pass against us, shower rocks on our heads, and single out our leaders with unfailing aim,—these groveling mountaineers who know not the joys and brilliance of life, creeping amidst eternal snows, and snatching with greedy hand their stinted ear of corn?

Yet, poor as we are, we never envied our neighbors their smiling sun, their gilded palaces; we never strayed from our peaceful huts to blast the happiness of those who had not injured us. The traveler who visited our valleys met every hand outstretched to welcome him; for him every hearth blazed; with delight we listened to his tale of distant lands. Too happy for ambition, we were not jealous of his wealth; we have even refused to partake of it. Frenchmen! You have wives and children. When you return to your beautiful cities, amidst the roar of trumpets, the smiles of to your beautiful cities, amidst the roar of trumpets, the smiles of the lovely, and the multitudes shouting with triumph, they will ask, Where have you roamed? What have you achieved? What have you brought back to us? Those laughing babes who climb upon your knees, will you have the heart to tell them, "We have pierced the barren crags, we have entered the naked cottage to level it to the ground; we found no treasures but honest hearts, and those we have broken because they throbbd with love for the wilderness around them? Clasp this old firelock in your little hands; it was snatched from a peasant of Tyrol, who died in the hands; it was snatched from a peasant of Tyrol, who died in the vain effort to stem our torrent!" Seated by your fresides, will you boast to your generous and blooming wives, that you have extinguished the last ember which lightened our gloom?

Happy scenes! I shall never see you more! In those cold and stern eyes I read my fate. Think not that your sentence can be terrible to me! But I have sons, daughters, and a wife who has shared all my labors; she has shared, too, my little pleasures,—such pleasures as that humble roof can yield,—pleasures that you

My little ones! Should you live to bask in the sunshine of manhood, dream not of your father's doom. Should you live to know it, know too, that the man who has served his God and country with all his heart can smile at the musket leveled to pierce it. What ie death to me? I have not reveled in pleasures wrung from are pure. My death is nothing. O that my country could live! O innocence or want; rough and o that ten thousand such deaths could make her immortal!

Do I despair then? No; we have rushed to the sacrifice, and high schools grammar schools and colleges the offering has been vain for us; but our children shall burst it includes private and parochial schools; these fetters; the blood of virtue was never shed in vain. Freedom it includes prisons, jails and reformatcan never die! I have heard that you killed your king once be- orie cause he enslaved you; yet, now, again, you crouch before a single steam or ferry boats, and again without man who bids you trample upon all who abjure his yoke, and man who bids you trample upon all who abjure his yoke, and shoots you if you have the courage to disobey. Do you think that, when I am buried, there shall breathe no other Hofers? Dream will be over $20,000 spent at a modest csyou that, if today you prostrate Hofer in the dust, tomorrow Hofer
