

FIND THE MURDERERS - DON'T COME BACK UNTIL YOU DO FIND THEM

The Order to the Yukon Mounted Police Which Solved a Triple Murder Mystery.

(New York World.)

Here is a story of the most remarkable police force in the world—a story of the detectives of the British North-west of the men who ferret out the murderer mysteries of the tangled wilderness of the Yukon.

It is a story, says the New York World, of human bloodhounds, of men who once on the scent never pause until the criminals they are pursuing are run to earth.

In the territorial jail of the Klondike, at Dawson, lie two men, whom the wonderful detectives of the Northwest charge with the murder of four men in the remote wilderness of the Yukon valley.

Their names are Victor Fournier and Edward Labelle. They were captured after a chase covering thousands of miles, over mountain and valley, across river and lake.

When the long chase was over the bloodstained blankets of murdered men were traced to the pockets of the men arrested.

In the depths of the forest, hundreds of miles from human habitation, and confronted by the frontier Sherlock Holmes who had followed them so far, each swore that the actual killing had been done by the other.

The murders took place on a little island in the British Yukon. Leon Bouthlette, Joseph Guy Beaudoin and Alphonse Constantin were slain by Fournier, by Labelle or by both. Down below Dawson, on the American side, Gilbert Dufors was shot to death by Labelle, according to the statement of Fournier.

WORK OF DETECTIVES BEGINS. Immediately after the murders became known, the most remarkable police force on the American continent, perhaps in the world, went to work.

day or two in discreet inquiry about Whitehorse as to the movements of this quintette which started down the river in June.

WELSH GETS ANOTHER CLUE. Then Welsh had more luck. He found in Peter Rook, a Whitehorse grocer, a man who sold a small quantity of provisions to the boat party, and who knew both Fournier and Labelle by name and by sight.

Everything that Welsh learned was passed down to Dawson. Then Welsh, impressed by Rook's story, crossed the mountains to Skagway, following the train of Labelle.

On August 1, three miles from Ogilvie, on the banks of the Yukon, another body was found. It, too, was conveyed to Dawson. No one recognized it. It was frozen and placed with that of the other unknown.

With the information already in hand Major Wood and his men at once and instinctively connected this third body with that of the other unknown.

On Aug. 24 "Pete" Fournier quietly walked into a Dawson gambling-house and began to play. He unfolded a small roll of bills and bought his chips.

The pursuers began a systematic search of the logging camps, first in western Washington and then across the Cascades to the eastern part of the state.

White Welsh and Rook were on the chase for Labelle and while Major Wood and his men were securing the Yukon for Fournier, the news of the triple murder had spread through the whole dominion of Canada and aroused the interest of every officer of the law.

LABELLE GETS BLOOD MONEY. "I crept up close and looked around both under the eye of the service. The unknown body awaiting identification at Dawson was neither of them.

"I can pay you that money now. Just forget this 'ere all right," I was so frightened I didn't know what I was doing, but I took the money, $35, which he handed to me.

"When we were in Dawson this spring Labelle came to me and said, 'Pete (he always called me Pete), let's go to Whitehorse.' We thought there might be some games running there.

The American authorities on the lower Yukon found the body of Gilbert Dufors, where Fournier said he had killed. The corpse was picked up Oct. 1 and fully identified as Bagie.
