ANNABEL

THE TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

RIVAL AT ROCESTONE — TABLEAUX.

"That is for Augusta to give," said Mr. Langton, looking to his wife, "She, and she alone was cognisant of the progress and issue of the fatal malady. I linew nothing, dreamed nothing of it till after the end had come. I wish I had and sh, a thousand times have I wished that."

"You know my reason for not telling you, Joseph," interposed Mrs. Langton.
"I did not wish to add to the many troubles I mew yon had to bear, but I was also ignorant of the truth, and apprehended no danger."

"Yes, I know, I know; you did verything that was possible for our poor darling, but I cannot help grieving because I did not see her, and I never shall cease to regret it."

Mrs. Langton had returned to her seat, and Philip rising, went and too a chair directly opposite her.

"Now tell me att," he said huskily.

"All?" she echoed, regarding him with a startfed fook.

"Yes, all that happened in France, every particular of the illness—how Annabel felt and thought—all that she said,
and—and her last message to me."

"Oh, not now, Philip; you are tired, you need rest. This evening perhaps."

"No, Mrs. Langton, this very hour, please. I can take no rest, I can do nothing till this is related to me. The greatest kindness you can do me is to comply with what I ask—the greatest cruelty you could inflict on me would be to delay that recital. Now, you will hesitate no longer, will you?"

"Certainly not," cried the merchant, emphatically. "Augusta, you must gratity the poor boy in this, We can easily anderstand how important it is to him."

Mrs. Langton turned pale, and was manifestly uneasy. She had prepared herself so far for this, but, did not expect to be called on so soon to pour into Philip; sear her fabricated story. Yet she saw no way of escape. Philip sat with his large hollow eyes fixed on her face, waiting for her pararative, and determined to have it then and there.

Suddenly the remembrance of Barnard Hayes waiting in the next room stashed upon her, and with it the thought that the h

"Oh, any time will do for that," he hastily exclaimed. "The object for which I went there is of no consequence now. Fray, do proceed with the relation of that which is all in all to me."

Thus adjured, she had nothing for it but to go on weaving anew the tissue of falsehoods which had already deceived her husband. Now, however, she required to be far more minute, and a woman of less talent would have failed to find ready answers to the thousand questions which Philip's bereaved heart prompted him to ask.

But, spurrad on by the emergency, she which Philip's bereaved heart prompted him to ask.

But, spurred on by the emergency, she never heaitated a moment, but found atonce a plausible roply to every interrogation, till Philip had received what he believed to be a full and accurate account of the illness and death of Annabel, on which his mind would fiwell with a sad brooding through all the future years. Still, it was a severe ordeal through which she had to pass, and she was thankful when a diversion was affected in her favour by the entrance of her brother. The interval from the arrival of Philip had been so long that the lawyer made sure that all was right, and came gliding in with his usual bland and silken smile.

eure that all was right, and came ginning in with his usual bland and silken smile.

"My dear Mr. Woston, glad to see you returned, though extremely sorry on account of the sad event which has happened in your absence."

Philip who did not notice his entrance, sprang to his feet when he heard his weice, and turning round, saw the lawyer at his side, with his hand held out to spreat him.

at his side, with his hand held out to greet him.

He recoiled a step, the blood rushed to his brow, a fearfully stern expression eame into his face, and folding his arms and drawing himself up to his full height he said, in a voice whose calmness was that of concentrated passion—

"Judas—traitor! how dare you come into my presence thus?"

Mr. Langton rose to his feet electrified, Mrs. Langton rose to his feet clectrified, Mrs. Langton sprang from her chair in consternation, while the smile on the face of Barnard Hayes vanished, and his countenence assumed a sickly and cadaverous hue.

connenence assumed a sickly and cadaverous hue.

An English technical periodical points out an easy way of testing whether water is good and fit for general use. It says:
—Good water should be free from colour, unpleasant odour, and taste, and should quickly afford a lather with a small portion of soap. If half a pint of the water be placed in a perfectly clean, colourless, class-stoppered bottle, a few grains of the best white lump sugar added, and it le bottle freely exposed to the daylight in the window of a warm room, the liquid should not become turbid, even after exposure for a week or ten days. If the water becomes turbid, it is open to the grave suspicion of swage contamination; but if it remain clear, it is almost certainly safe. We owe to Heisch this simple, valuable, but hitherto strangely neglectedtest.

The members of the Buffalo Caledonia Curling and Quoit Club met at Fort Erie, on Thursday afternoon, on invitation of Mr Duncan McLaren, of Fort Erie, to compete at quoits for a medal and prize presented by that gentleman. The medal was won by Lewis Kirkover; 2nd prize, Joseph Frew; 3rd Wm Brown, alias Jas. Dobbie. The presentation over, speeches and sentiments became the order of the day.
