A STERLING HEART.

"Then came this way, please: there is an opening in the world, a fine view, and the young man turned back in the direction from which he came, walking beside Shirley and talking in an affable, entertaining way that was peculiarly charming. Shirley, who had been afterward learned was one of his many fascinating characteristics. Mrs. Wallace, however, instead of following at his master's heels, as was his custom, kept close beside Shirley, who had evidently charmed every one, and then patted him caressingly on the head.

A walk of five minutes brought them to the opening that Lord Wallace had mentioned, and there, spread out before him, admiring eyes were the grandest place that Shirley had ever seen.

A magnificent park lay at her feet—where they were standing on a gentle rise of ground—and this was dotted here and there with venerable and majestic beeches, interposed with many other varieties of trees, while out of the midst of them there arose a great stone mansion, of imposing appearance, which was rendered most picturesque by the wealth of ivy and other vines which were almost entirely overgrown. Back of it, and beyond another wide stretch of park, gleamed the beautiful St. Charles, which at that moment, with the bright sunlight streaming full upon it, seemed to be a picture of the fairest of the world.

"How beautiful," Shirley exclaimed involuntarily from Shirley's lips, while her animated eyes roved admiringly over the exquisite picture before her.

"Is it not?" queried her companion, with a thrill of tenderness in his voice. "To me it is the most beautiful place in all the world, and I have seen much of it. And yet, he added, with a quick suppressed sigh, "I should have rather than any other spot, it is very lonely, and a place of sorrow to me just now."

"Lonely?" Shirley repeated, a grave, sweet look of inquiry in the glance she lifted to him, for his face had seemed to her that he had suffered some recent and heavy grief.

"Yes," he answered, as he turned his pale face slightly from her and speaking in a subdued, repressed tone, "for one short year, and now just about your age, and now my aged mother, with my little crippled sister, and the exception of the servants, are the only inmates of my mansion."

"Years involuntarily spring to the fair girl's eyes, for the quiver in her companion's voice, even more than the words, touched her deeply, while the mere fact that he had made no mention of his child's mother, conveyed to her some domestic tragedy must also have left its blight upon him."

"He had been married, and evidently had lost his wife, but Shirley was somehow impressed that she had not died."

"He had a living trouble, while the recent death of his sister had apparently been a blow from which he had not yet recovered. She made no comment upon what he had told her, for she felt that words of sympathy from her, a stranger, would be meaningless, and grate harshly upon his bleeding heart."

"So she stood quietly by his side and gazed on the enchanting scene before her, while she tried to draw his thoughts that were fast flying to pity for him, that with so much to make life enjoyable, he should have been so stricken thus early in life."

"Presently he turned to her, and, observing how much she was his own eyes softened, while a smile of infinite sweetness curved his lips, for he felt that her unspoken sympathy was far more powerful than the choicest verbal expression could have been."

"You have no doubt noticed the beeches," Miss Livingstone, he remarked, to turn her attention from the sad train of thought which he had aroused.

"Yes, and they are magnificent," she replied, with eager appreciation.

"My grandfather," Shirley imported from the home of his ancestors, and set them out with his own handsome eyes. "You are wondering if it is possible that I am a descendant of the notable Sir William Wallace, he quickly remarked. "Yes, I am obliged to confess," he went on, his eyes still twinkling as he saw the look of dismay which overspread her face. "I can trace my ancestry back to him in a direct line. I trust, however, that all elements of outward success so distinguished him were long since obliterated from the race. At all events, I assure you that I am not a descendant of his, but a descendant of his great-grandfather, who was a very good and loyal subject of England."

though unintentionally, by her remark. "It was referring only to the natural beauties of the place when I spoke," she said, after considering for a moment how best to reply without hurting him more deeply, while she lifted her grave, sweet eyes to him. And surely, Lord Wallace, one could not conceive more delightful spot than Lyhurst as it lies before us at this moment."

"That is true," he answered with a heavy sigh. "I realize that few people are so good as you, Miss Livingstone, as mine; and yet, Miss Livingstone, it takes something more than 'natural beauty' to make an 'ideal home.' Shirley wondered if there was a double meaning to his words. Had his wife been killed by nature with great beauty, and had she made his life wretched? She felt that he had some terrible secret sorrow, but of course she shrank from prolonging a conversation so painful, and after a moment of silence, she remarked, while her eyes rested on the exquisite landscape:

"I think that the master of Lyhurst must be a very fine and an almost perfect man, from the little world of glass and of stone."

"You are passionately fond of flowers, Miss Livingstone, and I derive great comfort in watching their growth and development. There are certain plants that take to me almost like companions. Does that sound extravagant to you?" Lord Wallace inquired with a smile.

"No," said Shirley, her face all aglow, "for I have often had the same feeling. Pansies, for instance, seem almost like animated faces to me; an orchid like a thing of life and feeling; but I am afraid that sounds sentimental to you," she concluded, and will show you my conservatory."

"Thank you," Shirley said; "that will be a great treat, and no doubt Madame will be glad to accept the invitation, although she concluded, with a smile of amusement dimpling her cheeks, "she cannot be said to be very fond of flowers."

Her companion laughed out heartily at the observation.

A MOLDER'S AGONY

Montreal Furnishes a Sensational Story of Years of Suffering and Final Release.

The most cruel of all diseases is Dyspepsia. Relentlessly and without intermission, it tortures its victim. Night and day, week after week it keeps up the agony.

Even in its first stages of Sour Stomach, Heartburn, and occasional spells of indigestion, it is hard enough to bear, but when the subject graduates to the state of Chronic Dyspepsia, life is positively a burden.

Wm. Arkwell, of De La Ringer avenue, Montreal, is an example of the havoc Dyspepsia can work in a strong man's life.

Mr. Arkwell is a moulder. The laborious character of his employment made abstinence from food an impossibility. And yet, to eat, meant torture to him. He tried almost everything, but could get no relief. He says:

"I have been troubled with Sour Stomach and dyspepsia for over three years. I could not bear to eat without suffering the utmost agony. I tried medicine after medicine, but it could get nothing to help me. I was very much run down and felt miserable. About six weeks ago someone, I forget who, suggested Dodd's Dyspepsia Tablets as a probable cure for me."

"The first box relieved me, and I used altogether three boxes, and am now free."

"I can eat anything and everything without the slightest unpleasant after-effects, and I am sure I am completely cured."

"What a benediction relief must have been to this suffering man!"

A case of three years' standing is supposed by many physicians, to be so chronic as to be incurable, and yet the chronic case of Dodd's Dyspepsia Tablets effected a complete and permanent cure.

Notice what Mr. Arkwell says, "Three first box relieved me, and three boxes made me free."

Dyspeptic, will you, too, be free?

FRAUDS PERPETRATED ON THE AFFLICTED
Missouri—Magnetic Healing Humsbogs Found Guilty—Must Not Use the Mails.

Kansas City, Mo., April 25.—In the federal court here, Stephen A. Well-posed and Joseph H. Kelly, president and secretary respectively, of an institute of magnetic healing, at Nevada, Mo., pleaded guilty to indictments charging them with using the mails to defraud. Sentence was reserved.

The institution advertised to heal "all diseases known to man or woman," giving "absent treatment," and did such a tremendous mail order business that the Nevada post-office was raised from a fourth to a first-class office.

A fraud order issued by the post-office department, demanding that the mail be followed by grand jury indictments.

FAITH SAVED HER $500.
Toronto, April 25.—Paul D. Hare, charged, in company with an accomplice named Sayles, a New York attorney, with defrauding Mrs. Currie, of this city, out of $400 by wiring for that amount to get her husband, Capt. Currie, out of jail in New York, when, as a matter of fact he had never been arrested, secured to have cast his net rather widely. Mr. T. G. Blackstock, of the Gooderham-Blackstock mining syndicate, was in New York last week. His wife got a dispatch to telegraph $100 and mail $400 to Paul D. Hare, at the Tombs, New York, to get "a friend" out of jail. Mrs. Blackstock decided to await developments. Her faith saved her $500. Mr. Blackstock thinks the trick has been widely played within the past few days on business men who are known habitually to visit New York.
