brought down the house, and compelled her, tired though she must have been, to respond to an encore. Mordkin gave a wonderful dance with a great bow and arrow, that provoked a storm of applause. A series of Polish dances followed, given by four couples. It was a delightful number.

The last number was the Bacchanale by Pavlowa and Mordkin. It was a blood-stirring, riotous dance, full of abandon.

As to the orchestra, Conductor Stier deserves the thanks of the theatrepoers of London for bringing so fine an organization to this city. It is composed of true artists, whose work is above criticism.
