THE COURSE.
 The course over which the race was rowed lies between the city of Washington on the one side and the historic hills of Virginia on the other. It is well sheltered except from a south east wind, which is so unusual in that latitude that the waters are rarely disturbed. A strong north west breeze will also ruffle the river to some extent, but the city of Georgetown, which is situated on a rising slope, breaks the force of any wind from that quarter. The course has been often used for amateur contests between local boat clubs. A long line of red flags, placed one-eight of a mile apart, marked out the route followed by the rowers. The first one was placed at a point about one hundred yards below the Aqueduct bridge (a structure which connects Georgetown with Virginia) and near the northern bank of the river. The course proceeded from that point in a south-easterly line towards the north eastern extremity of Annapolis Island, where a white flag marked the turn. It thence stretched out in a straight line towards the National Observatory grounds, and thence across the channel to near the southern extremity of Long Bridge, where the stake-boat was stationed. The angle at the turn was an easy one, not less than one hundred degrees, and could be made with two strokes of the oar. There was no perceptible current in the river. The tide, which here rises and falls about three feet, was at its height, and the race was fortunately commenced before the ebb had begun.
