They sell their weekly editions at less than cost, in a foolish and hoggish endeavour to drive the country weeklies to the wall. They send evening editions to Hamilton and other cities, to be sold for less than the cost of white paper, and the people buy them for wrapping paper. Lately, one of the rivals reduced the price of advertisements, and the other has been publishing advertisements for nothing. Having cut their own throats till their heads are nearly severed from their bodies the Globe and Mail seek to replenish the vital fluid at the expense of the printers. One can pity a man when he is hard up through misfortune, but the Globe and Mail have no right to be hard up. In endeavouring to kill the other, each has weakened itself. Now that it has been found necessary to shift the burden upon innocent shoulders, the Globe and Mail should quit fooling, and endeavour to make an honest living by legitimate trade."
