Derwent declared himself fully equal to it; and indeed his interest was so much roused that he forgot his fatigue. The hospital—a rather imposing structure built around a pleasant court, with cleanliness and space and sunshine everywhere—was as perfect in its arrangements as everything else on the hacienda seemed to be. There was only one or two patients in it at present; but everything was so attractive in appearance, and so well managed, that it was evident sickness was as little a misfortune at Miraflores as care and kindness could make it. He did feel very much better when, an hour later, he made his appearance in the dining-room where Don Maurizio greeted him cordially, and a tall, dark man rose and offered his hand with a smile of recognition. For an instant Derwent was puzzled. Then, like a flash, the scene at the mine occured to him, and even before Don Maurizio said "Senor Barrera," he knew who it was. "Senor Barrera wishes to express to you his sincere sympathy and regret for your wound. He has come, by my request, to talk the matter over, and after a while we will do so.
