No Better Than Opium

SINCE the Classics vs. English matter referred to in these pages a few weeks ago from the Fortnightly Review, other oracles have been taking a hand in the controversy. We quote from August Current Opinion:

The defence of the classics in American education is eloquently summed up by Senator Henry Cabot Lodge in this manner:

"To the mass of mankind science means the steam-engine and the telegraph, the telephone, the dynamo, and the motor-car, wireless telegraphy, and aeroplanes. No one would think of belittling the value and helpfulness of these wonderful inventions which have beneficent purposes. But they all minister to physical comfort. They leave the soul of man untouched. The spirit of man, that which is highest in him, is not lifted up and strengthened by an automobile or a traction-engine or even by an incandescent electric lamp. But the thoughts of men, of the philosophers, the moralists, and the preachers of religion, of artists and architects, of the dramatists, the singers and the poets, whether conveyed to us in paintings, statues, and buildings, or in books, are the real forces which have moved the world."

The case against the classical languages, as presented by H. G. Wells in the same review, is an attack on R. W. Livingstone's "A Defence of Classical Education" (Macmillan). Mr. Wells declares that most of those who are most vigorous in their claims that a knowledge of Latin and Greek is most helpful in the creation of a fine English style, are themselves, for the most part, poor and mediocre writers of English. "If these men do not use their own language nicely, if they miss its subtle opportunities and reason in English with a blunted edge, we are left skeptical by their enthusiasm for the unapproachable subtlety of two languages which, after all, they cannot possibly know so well nor use so freely as they do their own."

The fact, Mr. Wells, continues, that they have failed to bring the treasure over into English (since translations are said to fail in this), "is the most fatal flaw in their very flawed case." One must approach this problem in the role of a father, Mr. Wells thinks. "I wanted my boy to be as highly educated, as well educated, as possible. . . . He is to be an illuminated man." But, even granting the value of the humanities, the father must remember that, after all, his son is English or American.

"He is going to think in English, and he will not do that well unless he has exercised himself in every possible use of our most flexible, beautiful, expressive, and very difficult tongue. He cannot afford to keep it only for the meaner uses, because it will be necessarily the medium of all his private thinking. Greek literature may contain the most marvelous intellectual yeast, but it is no real good to him until it is fermenting and reacting in that flow of English thoughts and ideas which will be the essential aim. I do not want him to go off for private mental exaltation into a study, and come out of it again not even trailing clouds of glory into his every-day life. Such learning is no better than opium"

One stroke of a bell in a thick fog does not give any lasting impression of its location, but when followed by repeated strokes at regular intervals the densest fog or the darkest night cannot long conceal its whereabouts. Likewise a single insertion of an advertisement as compared with regular and systematic advertising is in effect not unlike a sound which, heard but faintly once, is lost in space and soon forgotten.
