was it? Have ye been swearin' off ag'in on gallivantin' after the girls, or was it the liquor ye put your oath on this time? Sure, he says, turnin' to the others, 'it's his tinder conscience makes me like him, and if girls would be leavin' him alone and he wasn't so good-lookin', he'd make less trouble for the hearts of them. As regardin' the liquor, now, I'm not sayin' but what—

'Ye're a murderin' liar, Dinnis O'Toole!' I yells at him when I could catch me breath from the treach'ry of him, mixin' the truth with black lies to ruin me chancet with Katy and the old man! 'If I could be gittin' on me feet I'd break ivry bone in your sneakin' body!' I says, chokin' with the rage that was on me and cursin' the paint on me back that kept me from killin' him.

'Oh,' says he, swellin' up the chest of him, 'words is easy things, but I'd be makin' ye eat them ye've just spoke if ye wasn't out of your head with the sickness, and can't ye take a bit of jokin' from a frind?' he says. 'And what is the matter with ye, anyway?'

'Hell was heaven by the side of that minute. Here was that big lynn' gomach insultin' me and spoilin' me last chancet with Katy and the polayee force, and me growin' in the ground like I was a toadstool! I could see she was talkin' to Dinnis a bit from spite, believin' I'd been desayvin' of her and thinkin' me a coward and a lunnytie besides that, and O'Grady himself, the old spancelled goat, was regardin' me like I was two lunnyties and drunk wans at that. Dinnis, the wretch, was smilin' wan of him sweet smiles of his and whisperin' to Katy confidential, seein' himself on the polayee force for ever by reason of bein' married to O'Grady's own daughter. And that not bein' enough to torment me, I begun feelin' thim ants ag'in crawlin' all over me, furious.

'All to wanet me quick wits and me good judgment come back to me and I seen that havin' nothin' to choose from, they was but wan thing to do. I couldn't in anny way look more of a fool than I was lookin' already and I might as well be showin' Dinnis up for another, and maybe, by destroyin' his chancet with the both of them, I could build up me own ag'in. And annyways, whin ye've fell from the elivinth-story window they ain't no more can happen ye after hittin' the ground.

'Listen, Mr. O'Grady, and you, Miss O'Grady,' says I, lookin' up at them, and with the sound of me own voice I seen how fine me plan was and that Dinnis was as good as done for. 'I'll tell ye the whole truth from the beginnin' and ye can judge atween the two of us!'

'At wanet Dinnis quit whis-perin' and wint a bit white in the face, but I wint right on, keepin' me eyes on all three of them and tellin' thim all of it—how Dinnis betrayed our agreement and painted thim blasphemous letterin's on me, so he could ruin me with his lynn' tongue whilst I was helpless—me Irish pride keepin' me from movin' so anny wan could see me back—clean down to the lies just off the oily lips of him, but omittin' about Katy and wan or two other things.

'It done me good to see O'Grady beginnin' to scowl at Dinnis as I wint on with me story, though Katy laughed a bit wanet or twict. As for Dinnis himself, ye couldn't tell what was goin' on inside him, but his face was red and his lips twitehin' so I thought he was on the edge of cryin'.

'But the impudence of him! The minute the last word was out of me mouth he steps up to old man O'Grady, bold as ye please, though his mouth was still trimblin' round the corners.

'Mr. O'Grady,' says he, his voice shakin', 'whin ye are through listenin' to me excited frind Mr. Moran, I'll be askin' another word with ye about whin I'm to join the force. And at the same time, sor,' he says, sinkin' his voice so Katy couldn't hear him, but I could, bein' nearer, 'and at the same time, sor,' says he, easy and cheerful, 'I'll be askin' your permission to pay me court to your daughter!'

'Old man O'Grady spun round on him and give him a look like he would bite him, and Dinnis turned his back and run, throwin' himself down on the ground a little ways off and rollin' about with his face covered with his hands and his body shakin' like his troubles was murderin' him. The old man turned to me wanet more:

'Git up, thim, and let's see thim letters on ye, me frind,' says O'Grady.

'Faith,' I says, blushin', 'they're that humiliaytin' I ain't seen thim meself yit, but the shame's none of me own for all that, though I'm wishin' Miss O'Grady would be lookin' the other way; I says, gittin' up slow by reason of wan of me legs bein' asleep, and turnin' me back round to him.

'Just thim Dinnis let out a laugh like he was a lunnytie entirely and the next minute O'Grady busted out himself and Katy joined in with thim, laughin' so it made me weak with the shame of it!'

'I made wan grab at me coat, tearin' it off me and twistin' round at the same time to see the backs of me legs, and—so hip me hiven, they wasn't a mark on me!'
