Lady Marjorie's Love

He could not have spoken more gently and compassionately if he had had Lady Marjorie's slim girl's figure pale little face, and big, soft, brown eyes before him at the moment, but then he was naturally kind hearted, as kind hearted as his fine old father, and capable of pitying even a raw-boned and green-eyed damsel had any such come in his way. Mr. Chadburn sighed again, and again shook his head.

"Just what I say my boy—just what I said the day I went down there and saw her poor little thing. And it was an abominable shame to keep her in total ignorance of these things, and to have her kept, I must have been a frightful blow to her. And she is as proud as Lucifer—too, to make it worse. I could see that. Proud as Lucifer."

"Lady Clara Vere de Vere?" Jim made the half questioning suggestion lightly, but there was a sudden change in his face that looked like disappointment. Possibly his mental picture of Lord Marlingford's penniless daughter had not been of this sort of type.

"Oh?" said Mr. Chadburn rather vaguely. "Perhaps he had not caught the words, quite possibly he did not understand them." "Such a pretty creature too," he said gently—"poor little thing."

"Pretty is she?" His son's face brightened with a young man's natural interest, for beauty in distress is inevitably more attractive than mere femininity, though never so exalted and virtuous. "I saw the Earl once, I remember," he said, "and he was handsome enough. Is she like him?"

"Like the Earl? Dear me, no, my boy—not at all. A slender bit of a creature, with brown, curly hair, a slip of a girl you know. Not at all what you would call a fine woman, not at all—just the reverse. But I don't care for your strapping, lanky, overpowering sort of women myself."

"Nor I, dad—by any means." He had been lighting a cigarette as they talked, and was now leaning back in his chair again, puffing it enjoyably. "So she's pretty, is she? So much the better, let's hope, for her. By the way, what's her name?"

"Marjorie. Rather old fashioned, eh?"

"Rather. Pretty quaint sort of a name, though—the sort of name to go with brown eyes. And her ladyship, the Countess, sir—is she of the overbearing order?"

"Well—Mr. Chadburn with an air of some doubt, rubbed his hair—through his thick white hair—perhaps she may be a little, Jim—if we put it that she could be if she liked I don't think that we shall be far out. An uncommonly handsome woman, though, mind you—uncommonly handsome. Plenty of her—long train, takes a good deal of time to move, dignified, that sort of thing, you know," said the old gentleman rather vaguely, and unconsciously drawing himself bolt upright as he recalled the staidness of Lady Marlingford. "But you know, not exactly what I should call comfortable, my boy. You understand?"

Young Chadburn with a slightly amused smile, nodded as if he understood completely, as indeed he did, having somehow contrived to conjure up a portrait that was really remarkably like the Countess. Perhaps, when now both were silent for a minute or two, he was contemplating it. Mr. Chadburn broke the silence by leaning forward and lightly laying his hand on his son's knee.

"Jim."

"Well sir?"

"When you go down to Castle Marling you will see Lady Marjorie?"

"I suppose so if she is there."

"You will think her as pretty as I did?"

"Very likely."

"You must if you use your eyes. I wish you may, my dear boy. I'm serious—I wish you may."

It was expressively said, so expressively that it was impossible to mistake its meaning. The quick and lively change of color in the younger man's face showed that he comprehended perfectly. Then he laughed, not without a certain awkwardness. "Lady Marjorie might not thank you," he said lightly.

Usually his father was quick to adopt any change of mood which might show itself in his son; it was not so now. Mr. Chadburn maintained his grave look and did not alter his position.

"I'm serious, Jim," he repeated. "I am quite serious. I've only seen the young lady for a minute or two, you will say; quite right, but all the same I will stake my word that she is as good as she looks—a pretty, sweet-tempered, loving, good little creature. You don't want money with your wife, and if you and she should care for one another—well, what could be better? She would never have to turn out of her home then, poor child. I thought of it when I was down there and saw her—I did, upon my word." He stopped for a moment, something like a cloud passing over his face, and lightly put his powerful hand on his son's knee.

"You are old enough to think about marriage now, Jim. You will be eight and twenty next year, you know. I should like you to settle if you can and the right girl, my boy. Only if, and when you find her, though; there is no happiness unless you get the girl right. And a house is not much of a home without a woman in it. This place isn't. Castle Marling will not be. No, not much of a home."

"He sighed heavily; the cloud on his face had grown dark. His son's hand clasped his."

"I know, sir; I understand. You don't miss what is missing in our home much more than I do, believe me. And if I don't speak of it—well, you know the reason. Words do no good, unhappily."

"No good, Jim—none," Mr. Chadburn sighed heavily again. "And as to what we have just been talking of you know well enough what used to be my wish, my boy?"

"That would never have done and could never have been," the other answered quietly and decisively. "Never upon either side, believe me."

"No, no; I know you said so," Mr. Chadburn returned sadly. "Well, well, it is all over now, and as you say words do no good." He sighed again and leaned back in his chair, making an obvious effort to resume his habitually bright and cheerful manner.

"Pook!" Mr. Chadburn said with a short laugh. "A flirtation here and a flirtation there with this bright pair of eyes and that pair, neither side in earnest yet pretending to be, that's not the sort of thing I mean, my boy, and well you know it. Seriously, seriously, the real thing, that's what I am talking of. You have never managed that."

"Well, no, sir. That has been beyond me, so far."

"Then see if you can manage it when you go down to Castle Marling. I say see if you can't, that's all. If you can't, well and good, if you can, so much the better. It's made a movement as though to dismiss the subject, turned in his chair and spoke in a different tone. "Now, about going," he said. "What do you say to-morrow?"

"To-morrow. Yes, as far as I know, as I said, I have nothing on." Jim spoke readily enough, but the reluctance which he had shown at the first mention of the subject was plainly felt by him again. Perhaps the prospect of making Lady Marjorie's acquaintance failed to tempt him, or perhaps he had found the reported dignity of the Countess discouraging. "Will there be any business to do?"

"A few things to settle with Petherick, no doubt. In fact, that is partly why I want you to go down, as I can't be spared just now. We shan't do better I think than to retain Petherick's services; he is a shrewd fellow and understands all the ins and outs of affairs. You can manage it."

"After a fashion, I suppose I can, sir; but I am not very well up to that kind of thing, I'm afraid. I'll tell you what I have been thinking since you mentioned the matter, and that is that you'd do a great deal better to send Barrington."

Music and Drama

George W. Lederer, who gave this country its first theatrical revue when he produced The Passing Show and followed the innovation with the form of early musical comedy that established his first fame and that of the New York Casino, where he produced it during many successive seasons—a form that The Belle of New York and its successors instanced—has just projected still another kind of musical play in Madame Sherry, so new in model that New York went mad over it. Described on the programme as a French vaudeville, Madame Sherry—the latest Lederer manifest—differs from the former Casino manager's output in that instead of playing the chorus up, i.e., making it a dominant element of the piece, he represses it in numbers, importance and action until it is scarcely more consequential than an added bit of scenery. The success of the Lederer novelty will sweepingly affect the musical comedy of the country. For already three musical comedies modeled on its lines, have been instituted since Madame Sherry's tremendous hit.

Madame Sherry will be seen here at the Grand on Saturday, February 15th with the same excellent cast that has marked even its earliest presentations, and that is expected with such a piece as Madame Sherry.
