MOODYNE!

THE CONVICT SHIP.

BY JOHN BOYLE O'REILLY.

CHAPTER XIII.—(CONTINUED.)

'Do you know who has nursed you through your sickness?' Draper moved his head negatively. 'Would you like to know?'

He had risen as he spoke—Draper's eyes followed his face. The strength of manhood, even of facial decay, having been drained by the fever, there was nothing left of Draper's real self but his wily nature.

When the heartbroken Harriet recovered from the excitement of the dreadful interview, her soul had only one feeling—remorse. As one dying of thirst might sit down on the burning sand, and commune with the delectating fire in the body, so this unhappy one sat down upon her pillow in the hospital room, and commended for hours with the newly-lighted consuming fire in her soul.

At last Mr. Wylie entered the hospital with the physician. He approached Harriet and spoke in a low tone, such as he had used when addressing her once before. 'Do you remember me?'

When they had disappeared into the hall, the old governor shook Mr. Wylie warmly by the hand. 'By the lord Zarry, sir, this is excellent,' he said, heartily. 'This d—d colony has been a monstrous long enough. If you succeed with your system, we'll make it a civilized country at last.'
