> Out of the agitation for reforms in Russia permanent good to religion is likely to arise, says the London "Catholic Times," if we may trust reports from St. Petersburg. As all who are acquainted with Russia are aware, the Orthodox Courch has been treated by M. Pobiedoncsteff as an instrument of bureaucracy. It has been constantly utilized for political purposes. As may be easily imagined, State interference has had a deadening effect. The Orthodox Church gradually ceased to supply the moral needs of the nation. The clergy were afraid to be active, and their influence steadily sank. Practically the religious condition of the Russian prople became a state of stagnation. Now there is an awakening. A scheme for holding a congress of Orthodox clergy for the discussion Church and its connections with the State is under consideration. The
