GERALDINE: Romance.

Lindley was the last member of the family who had seen James since the departure of the latter from Waringham, nearly six years before, he and the lawyer, Mr. Massey, having both visited the young man in prison, when he was awaiting his trial for the murder of the Irish farmer, Hughes. It was of the utmost importance, therefore, to Elizabeth, to know on what terms the two men stood toward each other; for, though the appearance of James would certainly alarm Lindley, on the other hand, the sight of Lindley, if they had not parted on good terms, might alarm James. The circumstances of her nephew's return were still a mystery to her; if he had been formally released, then all was safe, for a few days or hours would make him Sir James, and his generous, easy-going nature would make him slir James, and his generous, easy-going nature would make him slir James, and his generous, easy-going nature would make him slir James, and his generous, easy-going nature would make him slir James, and his generous, easy-going nature would make him slir James, and his generous, easy-going nature would make him slir James, and his generous, easy-going nature would make him slir James, and his generous, easy-going nature would make him slir James, and his generous, easy-going nature would make him slir James, and his generous, easy-going nature would make him slir James, the broken himself had been; yet, on the other hand, the evident state of depression he was in, his abrupt changes of manner, a certain nervous way of glass; the whidow was still fastened. Lindley was the last member of the pression he was in, his abrupt changes only cut himself against the broken of manner, a certain nervous way of glass; the window was still fastened, peering around him into the dark corners of the room, pointed to the supposition that he might, after all, have only escaped from prison, in which case that fact would have to be rection in the darkness, he was greet- has only so doin powers.

The next moment there were heard two short cries in men's voices, one loud and sharp and hissing, the cry of a horrible surprise, the other low, deep, murderous. The frightened wo-
