

who has called us to such a calling. You will, I am sure, take these feeble words as indicative of deep regard in our heart of hearts. And whatever measure of success it may be ours to attain in life, you will have the consciousness that, under God, it was due to your patient efforts or training.

Fellow students, you have been with us during many of the winters that are now past. We have sometimes called you by an uncomplimentary name in contrast to the regal title we assume for ourselves. But we assure you that hereafter we will never associate you with any of the powers or beings eduved from our studies on Demonology. We pray you not to think of us merely as censors of college morals, because at times we reminded you that it would be better for your health to sleep at night and play in the day time. You have sometimes nearly convinced us that the human voice can rival the thunder. We have sometimes sat up in bed thinking an earthquake had passed over our land. We hope you will have something equally interesting to remember us by. We part with you now, but it is only for a little time. You too will soon come and join this noble army into whose ranks we are now passing.

My class-mates, I have done your bidding. I have tried to express publicly some of the feelings with which you regard to-night's proceedings. What I have left undone you will have to do individually. To-night we separate. We have journeyed the years in company and have got to know each other as man is seldom known to man. Now we go each one to his own work. But we do not go our own way, nor yet in our own strength. The Eternal God is above us, and He shall watch over us when we are absent the one from the other. And in the consciousness of His presence let us be strong rightly to perform every duty, stoutly to resist every foe. We carry with us a magnificent message. It is the everlasting Gospel of Christ, whose we are, whom we serve.
