

MILK REGULATIONS SHOULDN'T RAISE PRICE

Dr. Hastings Refutes Charge Made by Milkmen—Middlemen Get Excessive Profits, He Says.

"Cleanliness in the production of milk is not going to increase the cost enough to justify raising the price. Water is plentiful, and it is good for cleaning purposes. By means of a little work cows can be kept clean. There is no excuse for an increase along those lines."

Dr. Hastings, M. H. O., so declared yesterday afternoon when he in regard to the statement by some milk dealers that the proposed bylaw to enforce sanitary conditions in all stables and on all dairy farms from which milk for city consumption comes, if passed would necessitate the raising of the price of milk.

"If the middleman could be done away with a very important question in the price of milk would be solved," continued the doctor. "It is a lamentable fact that the farmer who produces the milk gets only about one-third of the amount the consumer pays. He gets around 2 or 3-2 cents per quart, when the consumer pays 9 or 10 cents. There is something radically wrong in a system which permits of such a state of affairs."

"The proposed bylaw has no bearing on the subject of the cost of milk. Should increase Profit. When the milk producer adopts methods that are enforced in dairies within the city he will do a more profitable business. Cows kept under proper sanitary conditions—properly housed in buildings well ventilated, and kept clean—will give infinitely more milk than cows confined in improper places. "Sanitary stables are hotbeds for the dissemination of diseases peculiar to cattle."

"In the long run, all I am asking for is absolute cleanliness in the milk—the same as you ask for any other article on your tables."

"Another thing that our inspectors are now telling the milk producers is to adopt business methods in the conduct of their dairies. It has been shown that some cowmen are a dead loss. When the producer finds out how much milk each cow gives and eliminates the cows that do not pay, he will not need to charge so much for his milk in order to make a profit. Oftentimes the reason that a dairy does not pay well enough is that the proper amount of care and selection is not exercised in securing animals."

BIRDS' WORLD HAS CRIMINALS
Villains Among Feathered Folk Who Rob and Murder Like Humans.

Feathered folks, like human folks, have their frailties and faults. Certainly they have strength of character and excellencies, measurable by human standards. Perhaps the jay-bird and the blue jay are the more human traits, good and bad, than any other birds native to the country near Kansas City, remarks The Star of that city.

The shrike, or butcher bird, is slightly smaller than the jay, which it resembles in color, excepting the blue of the jay. The two birds really look alike and they have similar tastes and habits. The bee martin, or king bird, is dressed very much in the same style and he possesses the destructive qualities which distinguish the shrike and the jay. Nature, however, is not setting a mark as to quality in dressing these birds so much alike. The mocking bird has the same general garb, but with no qualities resembling those mentioned.

The shrike is distinguished for its cruelty to other birds. The reputation is an exaggeration of the bird's qualities. The shrike occasionally catches small birds and devours them. It catches mice also and grasshoppers for food. It sometimes impales its victims on thorns. Human beings would excuse the shrike for taking out of the storehouse of nature enough for its needs, but to leave birds dangling on a barb-wire fence is denouncing as cruel and revolting. This extension, however, may be urged in behalf of this practice: the bird is only exercising its legitimate skill, just as the human brother may accumulate more than he needs, just because he can do it and for the pleasure of the game. The butcher bird has no other way to make a living. His feet are weak and the thorn is used to hold the morsel. It is strange that nature should give the shrike weak claws and a strong beak. This bird takes what he considers his own. The butcher bird is lower in the scale of being than the jaybird, his habits testify to that. His voice is disagreeable, except his love note, which is fairly musical. His call is strident.

The shrike is a very pretty bird. Its nest is a clumsy affair. We should hardly look for exquisite workmanship in a bird of such habits as those of the shrike. The nest is about the same bulky structure as that made by the jaybird, but not quite so substantial. The sparrow hawk is a sort of link between the shrike and the small operators as birds of prey and the larger species, such as the owls, hawks and eagles, who are wholesale dealers in the same business. The sparrow hawk is larger than the jaybird, of modest but beautiful plumage; he is very swift and strong of wing. His food is almost any living creature that he can take, from a grasshopper to young chickens, though he is not usually troublesome at all about the poultry yard. He is quite gentle in his manner and dislikes argument; he goes quietly about his business, avoiding ugly situations and scenes of disturbance. He is a better mousetrap than a mousetrap, especially when he has a hungry brood in some hollow tree. The agriculturist should make no objection to the presence of the sparrow hawk in the neighborhood. He is a splendid forager.

A CZARINA'S ICE PALACE

The Building and All the Furnishings Were of Ice.

The use of ice for architectural purposes is an art that has been carried to a high state of perfection in northern countries, and some almost incredible feats have been accomplished in this curious branch of industry. Probably the most remarkable building constructed wholly of ice was the palace built on the Neva by the Czarina Anne of Russia in 1732. The first attempt to construct this building was unsuccessful, as the slabs of ice were too thin, and the building collapsed the first thaw.

Subsequently large blocks of ice were cut and squared with great care, and laid on the ground by skilful masons, who cemented the joints with water, which immediately froze. The building, when completed, was 54 feet long, 12 feet wide, and 11 feet high. It was of but one story.

The facade contained a door surmounted by an ornate pediment and six windows, the frames and panes of which were all of ice. An elaborate balustrade, adorned with statues, ran along the top of the facade and another balustrade surrounded the building at the level of the ground. The side entrance to the palace was a life size figure of an elephant, with his mahout on his back. A stream of water was thrown from the elephant's trunk day and night.

A tent of ice contained a hot bath, in which persons actually bathed. There were also several cannons and mortars of ice, which were loaded with bullets of ice and iron and discharged. The interior of the building was completely furnished with tables, chairs, statues, looking glasses, a clock, a complete tea service, etc., all made of ice and painted to imitate the real objects. A bedchamber contained a state bed, with curtains, a dressing table with a mirror, a bed-clothes, and a nightgown—all made of ice. There were ice candles burning naphtha, and most wonderful of all, an ice furnace containing burning logs, blocks of ice smeared with naphtha and then kindled.—Scientific American.

BLOODLESS BULL FIGHTS

Portuguese Enjoy Spanish Sport, But Omit Every Semblance of Cruelty.

The distressingly cruel treatment of animals so common in the Latin countries is almost entirely absent among the Portuguese, and for this reason their great national sport, the bull fight, is really an enjoyable spectacle to an American, writes Mrs. C. R. Miller in Leslie's Weekly. In the Portuguese version the bull is never killed, the horrible goring of horses—a feature of the Spanish fight—does not occur, for if a horse was injured in a Portuguese performance the rider would be raised from the ground and mobbed afterward. The men taking part are rarely hurt, although the skill displayed is much greater than that shown in the Castilian style of the arena. Occasionally they have a burlesque Spanish bull fight in Lisbon, with the cruelty eliminated. The horses ridden by the ploaders are armed and cannot be gored, and when the bull is to be killed the matador strikes him at the particular spot on the back of the neck which the sword almost instant death to the animal. Instead of killing the bull, however, the Portuguese matador's sword doubles up, after the fashion of the one used by the sword swallowers in our showmen, and a red mark appears where it has touched the animal's skin. Thus showing the audience that the matador has been successful. The bull then runs out of the ring uninjured.

PILL-MAKING CRABS.

These tiny creatures, which are mostly about the size of a pea, are found in abundance on the shores of the Malay peninsula. They are usually first perceived on the beaches, after the going down of the tide, when they give the beach the appearance of being covered with loose, powdery sand and holes of various sizes. Upon looking more closely, it is perceived that little radiating pains converge on the litter of sand to each hole, and that the sand itself is in minute balls.

At the approach of an observer these immediately become apparent a peculiar "twinkle," which is nothing else than the simultaneous and rapid retreat of a multitude of the tiny crabs into their holes.

Should one who is watching these curious little creatures take up his position by one of their holes and remain perfectly motionless, explaining the matter to himself, they will in time come out, when he will be enabled to see them at work.

SAVED BY DEFECTIVE CARTRIDGE

NEW YORK, Aug. 2.—A defective cartridge in a revolver this afternoon saved the life of Jeweler Jos. Eagle saved Brooklyn and prevented the robbery of his store by two young thugs. The desperadoes entered Eagle's store in mid-afternoon and while one of them engaged the jeweler in conversation the other pressed a revolver against Eagle's temple and pulled the trigger. The cartridge missed fire, and the thugs fled at Eagle's outcries, which followed.
