"It is not the custom in my profis-sion to betray confidences," said M.. Wardman, "We get a great deal of information, as every member of this body knows, no doubt, from our fiends in the body and our friends in other places, and the ethics of that stand is very rigid in my profession. We don't betray confidences even when the re-fusal to do so would entail great hardships on us."

"Do you regard, Mr. Wardman," said Senator Brackett, who was conducting the examination, "that breaking of standards of ethics to which you refer a greater offence than to permit the legislature to rest under the imputation charged in this article?'

charged in this article?"
"In my profession it is considered to be beyond the pale for any man to violate a confidence given to him when it is understood by him that he accepts that information in confidence. Tho he may use the matter to gove n his actions, he must not betray the man who gives it to him. I think every member of this body is awaie of that fact, because a great many of that fact, because a great many of the members of this body converse with newspaper men confidentially with the certainty that they will not be dragged into a matter that they do no wish to be.
