PUBLIC ASKED TO AID POE COTTAGE

Poet's Home in Need of Restoration — House in Fordham in Bad Condition. (New York Evening Post.)

It is such a little cottage, that one of Edgar Allan Poe's in Fordham, that it would seem preposterous for the people of this city, which had the luck to harbor for a little while one of the few great poets America has ever had, to undertake its upkeep and its restoration to the exact way it was when Poe was there.

For several years the house itself has been secure, as the property of the city and situated in Poe Park, on the Grand Concourse in the Bronx; but the maintenance has been placed in the hands of the Poe Cottage Committee, and without outside help maintenance is no longer possible.

There is little danger that these efforts in bringing back vitality to the dying place will go unappreciated; there have been almost 100 visitors to the cottage every day this summer, unnumbered in its look as it has been. Unfortunately the hundred visits a day have netted nothing for support, for the idea is to have the cottage open always, free to every one.

Most Peaceful Period. This period of Poe's life was, except for the illness of his wife, the best, most peaceful, and most productive of his life. In the very small study which looked out on a high and open space with cherry trees about with a view of hills which rolled away toward the Sound, he wrote much, as well as editing his own magazine, the Stylus, which he had started at last in 1848, after working on other magazines in Richmond, New York and Philadelphia. The magazine did not last long—nothing ever lasted long with Poe, his charm and genius being founded on the nearest thing to a mother he had, staying on with him after Virginia died. He was back when he died to the death of two years old; the years of luxurious adoption English schooling, riotous living at the University of Virginia, and being a most successful soldier were far behind him. It was a strangely quiet, beautiful, and poor little house in which so brilliant and rare a man should end. But the little better now that the shabby little place has no one but the public to keep it up.

A tablet to the effect that this is Poe's house was put on the house in 1919, in celebration of the 100 years since his birth. But more convincing evidence of the fact would be in the fitting up of the interior to look just as it did when he was there.

The little room on West Range at the University of Virginia, where the poet lived during his days at Charlottesville, has been restored by the chancellors, and over the door beneath the long, low arches is a bronze tablet with the inscription: "Donus Parva Magnum Poetae."

WORK THE PANACEA. Quoting from a speech recently made by Herbert Hoover, Sir John Willison, addressing members of the Hamilton Commercial Salesmen's Association, said he agreed with the noted economist that unless labor justified present high wages by increased production it must be prepared to accept lower wages.

Sir John spoke on the present outlook in Canada. This country was passing through extraordinary conditions at present. Just as we became unduly disturbed or unduly alarmed, just so would we make conditions that much worse. He endorsed the opinion of Mr. Hoover that a price adjustment which did not progress along easy stages would result in conditions changing for the worst with a crash.

"My own opinion is," continued Sir John, "that just in so far as we get away from all reactions adopted during the war the better off we shall be. There is no doubt that the era of falling prices has come. But there is a danger in falling prices just as there was hardship in increased prices. When all is said and done the answer to all our problems is work."
