In walking about the happy villages of the plain, butting against the merciless wind much as a madman would against a stubborn barn door, I chanced into the office of the Red River Gaz-tte, the next to the last paper upon the frontier. This little journal, hang ing upon the verge of civilization, as it were, presents a very creditable appearance. The editor, his wife and children do all the intel lectual and mechanical work. The print shop is a cozy little structure of one and answers for a dwelling as well In ore corner are the cases, in another the cooking stove, table and dishes, in another the press, and in the other a bed In the middle is another stove. It takes two stoves to have any effect on twenty square feet of this climate. The editor was not in, but his good wife, and one of his children were. The wife was writing editorials and making pies, while the child kept up fires and set type. It was a happy picture of diversified industry.
