Selected Literature.
Brilliant.
Wisdom's self retired solitude;
She plumes her feathers, and lets grow her wings.
Ben looked down at the promiscuous heap. There were receipts and old letters and tints of faded blossoms that had passed between him and Berenice in the days of their courtship.

"Why Berry?" he began, and then finding his voice suddenly he stopped short and turned away.

His wife saw in an instant what he had done, but with the perversity of a child, instead of trying to make reparation, as her woman's heart yearned to do, she made matters worse.

"I shan't look another bit," she said, petulantly, pushing the papers aside with her pretty feet. "I've wasted half the morning already. You bother me so I wish you were gone."

"I'm going now, then, Berenice. Good-bye!"

He did not even turn to look at her, but strode from the room out into the yard. Benny was playing before the doorway, and Berenice standing breathless heard him kiss the child and say:

"Good-bye, little one! Be a good boy to mother, don't forget."

That was the last. Then, after a moment of stunned bewilderment, she hurried to the door, he was gone.

But he would come back. All day long sitting with Benny on her knee, she said it over and over, he would come back and she would make it up to him.

Up it came, and in the dusk of the March sunset a sailor came up for her husband's sea-chest. Berenice was too proud and sensitive to let a question of such a nature, and she longed to see him, and to tell him how she felt.

As soon as the sun rose she made her way down to the pier, where his vessel lay, but it was too late—the craft had sailed at daybreak, and her husband had gone.

Month followed month, year drifted after year, and Berenice lived, and Benny grew up to a sturdy lad, never forgetting his father's parting command. He was a good boy to his mother; but all his simple, unaffected devotion, his love, his devotion, did not drive the unspeakable sorrow from her eyes, or the stinging remorse from her heart. And now she sat, hunched up in a chair, with her thin hands clasped, and such a wistful, hungry look in her great, shining eyes, that poor little Ben felt awed and frightened, and crept away to his half-brother in the corner, not daring even to kiss her again.

But the child could not sleep. He lay listening to the voice of the winds, as they roared and whistled through the pine hills, and to the ceaseless moan and thunder of the sea, rising his head ever and anon to look at his mother's white, sad face, and wondering in his child's mind, if God and his angels were so good and merciful, why they did not do something to comfort her. A strange terrible feeling crept over her, and she felt that she was alone in the world, and that she was a burden to everyone.

"Mother!" he called, gently, sitting up in his bed. "Oh, mother! what is it? I can't tell, but I feel something."

Indeed I do, mother!

But she did not heed him. The old sea dog lifted his pointed ears and listened intently; then he arose and padded across the child's bed, with a half-smile in his eyes, and Benny laid his cheek against his shaggy head.

"What is it, Trinton?" he whispered.

The dog listened again, then he bounded to the door and began to scratch and sniff beneath it.

"Oh, mother! mother!" called Benny in a hoarse whisper, as he rose with trembling hands and a death white face.

Why, my boy, my darling, she whispered, then she went to the door and opened it.

Trinton stood an instant with his ears erect and his nose to the ground, then he shot off, making great flying leaps, and uttering short exultant cries. Impelled by something stronger than himself, or her own will, Berenice followed him, and poor, frightened Benny was left alone.

Out through the wild dark night she went, down to the bleak, icy cliffs, and there, standing upon the desolate shore, his black, burly figure sharply defined against the pale, wintry sky, she saw the form of a man, with Trinton leaping and barking around him; and never pausing, never stopping to question or wonder, she flew on and on until she felt breathless and senseless at his feet.

When she awoke to life again she was in the cottage, sitting upon Benny's little bed, with the glimmer of the firelight before her, and Benny himself was hanging over her, patting her with his chubby hands and kissing her forehead, his blue eyes shining with a look they had never before known.

Then a wild, vague hope thrilled through her, and she started to her feet with a cry that rang above the din of the storm.

Yes, there he stood, bronzed and worn and changed, but with the same kindly eyes, Ben Chudleigh, her own husband. He held out his arms, but she went down prostrate at his feet.

"Oh, Ben! Oh, my husband! forgive me! I know I have, for he has given you back to me."

And Ben sobbing like a woman, gathered her in his strong arms, kissing her lips wildly, as she clung to him like a child.

Ben opened his handsome blue eyes in amazement.

"Why, Berenice," he said, not a bit cross, only decided, you know I gave it to you. I always give you things I want to take care of.

"A foolish habit," too, retorted Berenice, spitefully. Why not take care of them yourself? And you may hereafter. I won't have my desk crowded with such rubbish," and making good her words she tossed the papers she had been overlooking on the floor.

Ben looked down at the promiscuous heap. There were receipts and old letters and tints of faded blossoms that had passed between him and Berenice in the days of their courtship.

"Why Berry?" he began, and then finding his voice suddenly he stopped short and turned away.

His wife saw in an instant what he had done, but with the perversity of a child, instead of trying to make reparation, as her woman's heart yearned to do, she made matters worse.
