The Braes of Yarrow

An Historical Tale of the Sixteenth Century.

Meanwhile, he was perplexed much amazed by the conduct of his companion's horse now it would spring forward as if eager to distance the pursuers, and anon its speed would be relaxed, as if it or its rider were hesitating whether to go on or to turn back. 'I pray you, Mistress Douglas,' said Gilbert anxiously,' permit me to use my whip to that stubborn brute; for I must fell you that i believe we are followed, and that at on great distance, and if we come no better nevent his companion in a distressed tone.

The voice startled the hearer, for it was not like that of Mistress Douglas.
'Saints defend me, what can this mean?' he cried, checking his horse.
'I am not she you take me for—I am not she you take

The DRESS GOODS are pronounced by the betrayed your good mistress."

'Lord Binram, Lord Binram, he is the man,' cried the page in anguish.

'As I suspected. His ruffians are close upon us, Now if you care for your miserable life, he silent and obedient.'

'I will die if that will save you or sweet Mistress Mary.'

'Come then we will quit the road, and let these fellows pass on.'

Seizing the reins of the page's horse, he led it with his own into a thicket close by, and there waited. The boy Crawford appeared to be sincerely repentant of his treachery, and faithfully kept silent, shivering all the time with cold and alarm.

In a few minutes two horsemen galloped by the place of ambush, and in a few minutes more the retreating sound of the horses' hoofs was lost in the distance.

'Now,' said Gilbert sternly, 'If you be really sorry for the misery you have brought upon your lady, tell me truly how all this has happ?."

'I' will tell you truly,' answered the page with chattering teeth. 'On my way to Lady Douglas with your letter, Lord Binram stopped me, commanded me to come straight to my Lord Angus. He forced me along with him to a chamber where was none but he and I. With poignard at my throat he forced me to yield up your letter. He read it, then scaled it and bade me take it to my mistress, threatening me with instant death if ever I dared to hint at what had been done.'

'And you obeyed?'

'I was a coward, a false knave—Oh! masif ever I dared to hint at what had been done."

'And you obeyed?'
'I was a coward, a false knave—Oh! master, no vile name is vile enough for my treachery. I was fearful of the death he threatened me, and I obeyed him. An hour before vespers he summoned me, and my lady having dismissed me for the day, I went to him. Again, under fear of my life, he compelled meth don this woman's garb, and instructed me to meet you at St Cuthbert's as I have done. I full not know the meaning of this masquerading until I heard him whispering to the two fellows just gone by, bidding them follow me, and as soon as we had got clear of the city to settle with the man who would be with me. 'What then?'
'Then I determined that at every risk I would save you from them. Birnam parted with me near St Cuthbert's. When you spoke to me as to Mistress Douglas I understood the scheme that was afloat. You had a secret assignation with my lady; believing me to be ber, you quitted the rendezvous with me, Birnam took your place there to meet my lady.'

HUMBOLT'S EXPRIENCE OF EARTHQUAKES.—Humbolt, who witnessed several earthquakes, said that one never gets used to them, but on the contrary, his feelings of dread are intensified at each successive one which he experience. All beasts and birds partake of man's fear and seem panic stricken. Humbolt accounts for man's inability to become accustomed to, and consequently not to dread earthquakes, by saying that whatever we have at any time or under any circum-tances considered shaky, the earth has always stood firm, and when we find that toosing beneath our feet, it seems as though the very bottom of things had been knocked out. Every time the shock is repeated, the unreliability of our only support is forced upon our attention with augmented force. Other dangers can be foreseen and guarded against, but this is inevitable and remorseless.
