GERALDINE. A Lover's Romance.

She could not bear her miserable anxiety in inaction, so she went to her room, refused the services of sympathetic, curious Aurelie, and, dressing hastily, escaped out of the house to find beth watching her departure from one her return, discovered that lady's sharp wire fence which shut in the park on the east side. The suspicion that this espionage was not accidental rose in Geraldine's mind, and was confirmed before the day was over; for Elizabeth, having expressed a wish to accompany her in her usual drive, was evidently disconcerted when Geraldine at the last moment drew back on a plea of headache. And, when the elder lady brought back the letters from the Goldborough postoffice, she directed those for Captain Morrison without having to ask his wife for his address. So Geraldine asked the old butler whether his master had left a note for Miss Elizabeth as well as for herself.

"No, ma'am. The captain was with Miss Elizabeth in the study for about half an hour just before he started," replied Johnson, delighted to have this opportunity of putting his young mis-tress on her guard against the household bogey, whom he considered to be in league with the unpopular master

Then Geraldine was satisfied, and she returned to the drawing-room bright-eyed, animated, her depression of the from the hopeless, helpless despair about James which had paralyzed her, she had now the stimulating feeling that she was being watched, that the that she was being watched, that the a better spring; and the wicked spirit of the baby-waif which the Misses Gretton had worked so hard to crush rose up in the young wife as sho rose up in the young wife as she clinched her teeth and told herself that by a chorus of shrieks.

Geraldine's appearance was greeted by a chorus of shrieks. f that elderly lady with the hasp-like mouth and steely blue eyes really had undertaken the task of mounting guard over her, she should find the occupation more onerous than she expected.
