

The St. Andrews Standard.

PUBLISHED BY A. W. SMITH.

E. VARIS SUMENDUM EST OPTIMUM.—Cic.

$2.50 PER ANNUM, IN ADVANCE.

VOL. XLIV.

SAINT ANDREWS, NEW BRUNSWICK, JANUARY 2, 1878.

NO. 52.

Little Miss Snowflake.

BY JOSEPHINE BOLLARD.

Little Miss Snowflake came to town all dressed up in her brand-new gown, And nobody looked as fresh and fair As little Miss Snowflake, I declare!
Out of a fleecy cloud she stepped,
Where all the rest of her family kept As close together as bees can swarm, In readiness for a big snowstorm.
But little Miss Snowflake couldn't wait,
And she wanted to come in greater state, For she thought that her beauty would never be known.
If she came in a crowd—so she came alone.
All alone from the great blue sky Where cloudy vessels went scudding by,
With sails all set, on their way to meet The larger ships of the snowy fleet.
She was very tired, but couldn't stop On tall church spire or chimney top;
All the way from her bright abode Down to the dust of a country road.
There she rested all out of breath,
And there she speedily met her death, And nobody could exactly tell The spot where little Miss Snowflake fell.

TWO COBWEBS.

AN OLD MAN'S STORY.

"There, I've found the place, Cobweb."
"You have, papa?"
"I have."
"Not a dreadful detached village, or collage orney, papa?"
"No, no, no, no, my child. It's just what you asked me to get—old and rugged, and picturesque, and inconvenient, and damp, and littered with leaves, and four miles from any railway station; and now I hope you're happy."
"Oh, I am, dear, dear, dear father!" she cried, seating herself on my knee, and nestling her head on my shoulder.
"I am so, so glad. You've made me so happy, for I was very tired of London."

I did not answer but sat looking down on the smooth peachy cheek that one of my hands would keep stroking, and at the long yellow hair that hung down over the shoulders in waves, and in spite of myself a sigh escaped my lips.

Ruth—Cobweb as I always called her because she was so soft and downy—started up, gazed earnestly in my face, and then kissed me very, very fondly.

"Don't think about the past, dear father," she said softly—she always called me father when she was serious.
"Can't help it, child," I said mournfully; and then seeing the tears gather in her eyes, I tried to be cheerful, and smiled as I added: "I have the future as well as the past to make me sad, my dear."

She looked at me wonderingly, but did not speak, and I sat there holding her little hand to my heart as I thought of the past, and how ten years before, just as business was beginning to prosper with me, I was left alone with the little fair-haired girl of eight, who found it so hard to believe that her mother had been taken away never to return, only to live in our memories.

And then I thought of my other sorrow—the future—and pictured with an agony I cannot describe the day when I should have to resign my claim to another, and be left alone a desolate, broken old man.

I am naturally a very common, hard, and business-like old man, and terribly selfish. Cobweb had woven herself so round my heart, that in my peevish, irritable way, I was never happy when home from the city without she was waiting on me.

A fortnight later and we were settled down; and really, with all my London notions, I began to find the calm and repose of the country delicious. Cobweb was delighted, and constantly dragging me somewhere or another into the grounds of the pretty old place, where she arranged garden seats in the snug-gest, shadiest spots for my especial behoof.

There was a wilderness of wood adjoining the garden, which the former possessor had left in a state of nature, saying that he had the footpaths and tracks widened in their old winding ways, carefully turfed, and dotted with chair here and there.

One day I found Cobweb leaning on a dead bough which crossed an opening in the wood, where all seemed of a delicate twilight green. She was listening intently to the song of a bird overhead, and as I stopped short gazing at the picture before me, I said to myself with a sigh—

"All that's bright must fade! My darling I wish I had your likeness as you stand. Time flies," I muttered, "and the winter comes at last, with bare trees to the woods—gray hairs and wrinkles to the old."

A day or two later I was in the city, where I always went twice a week—for I could not give up business, it was part of my life—when an old friend dropped in, and in the course of conversation he said—

"By the way, Burrows, why don't you have your portrait painted?"

"Bah! stuff! What for?" I said.

"Well," said my old friend, laughing,

"I don't know, only that it would give a poor artist I know a job; and, poor fellow, he wants it badly enough."

"Bah! I'm handsome enough without being painted," I said gruffly.

Then as a thought flashed through my mind—for I saw again the picture in the wood with Cobweb leaning on the branch—

"Stop a minute. Can he paint well?"

"Gloriously."

"And is terribly hard up?"

"Horribly, poor fellow."

"How's that?"

"Don't know. He's poor and proud, and the world has dealt very hardly with him. It isn't so smooth with every one,

Jack, as it is with us."

"True, Tom, old fellow," I said,

"true. Well, look here; I'll give him a job. Would he come down and stay at my place?"

"Oh, yes, if you treat him well; but, as I tell you, he's a gentleman, and a man of honor."

"Oh, I'm not afraid he'll steal the spoons," I said, laughing.

"No," he said drily, "no fear of that.

But you'll make a good picture."

"Stuff," I said. "Do you think I'm going to be painted?"

"Why, what are you going to do then?" he said in an astonished way.

"Let him paint little Cobweb," I said, clucking, and rubbing my hands.

My friend gave a long whistle, and after a few more words he left.

It did not strike me then, but I remarked afterwards that he seemed disposed to draw back from his proposal; but I was now so wrapped up in my plans that I could think of nothing but the picture in the wood, and I went home full of it, meaning it for a surprise.

Two days later one of the servants announced a Mr. Grantley on business, and, on his being shown in, I found myself face to face with a handsome, grave-looking man of about thirty. He was rather shabbily dressed, and looked pale and ill as he bowed to Cobweb and myself, ending by staring at my child, as I thought, in rather a peculiar way.

This annoyed me—a stout, choleric, elderly man—for no one had a right to look at my Cobweb but me; and I spoke rather testily. I said:

"Now, sir, when you please, I am at your service."

"I beg your pardon," he said, in a low, musical voice. "Miss Burrows, I presume. One moment, please—don't move."

Cobweb was sitting in the bay window, and to my utter astonishment he quickly drew one of the curtains, and then half closed the other, so that the light fell strongly upon her hair.

I could not speak for the passion bubbling up in my throat, and as I stood gasping, he came and took my arm, led me aside, and then, pointing to where Cobweb sat, as astounded as myself, he said:

"That would be admirable, sir. We could not improve that natural pose."

"What the dickens—Are you mad, sir? What do you mean?"

"I beg your pardon," he said, flushing hastily. "I thought you understood. Mr. Elden said you wished me to paint this young lady's portrait. Am

I mistaken?"

"Chut!" I ejaculated, cooling on the instant. "I beg your pardon. Sit down, sir. You're hungry, of course. How stupid of me!—Cobweb, my dear, order some lunch into the dining room."

He smiled, returned the pressure of my hand in a frank, honest way that I liked, and then looked after my darling in a way that I did not like; for this was not what I meant, and my jealousy was aroused. I expected some snuffylooking old painter, not a grave, handsome young fellow. But I remembered Tom Elden's words—"He is a gentleman and a man of honor"—and, casting away my suspicious thoughts,

I entered into the subject at once.

"I'd half forgotten it," I said. "She'll make a good picture, eh?"

"Admirable, sir. That position struck me at once as I entered."

"I'll show you a better one than that, my boy," I chuckled. "But I'm a business man; what's your figure—the price, eh?"

He hesitated, and his hand trembled as he said:

"Would—fifteen guineas be too much?"

"Fifteen!" I said.

"I should take great pains with it—it will be a long task," he said, eagerly; and there was trouble in the wrinkles of his forehead. "But if you think it too much—"

"I think it is an absurd price, sir,"

I said, testily, for Elden had said he was very poor. "Why, Mr. Elden gave four hundred for a bit of a scrap of canvas—"

"By a very clever artist, sir," he said, with a grave smile.

"Look here," I said, "Mr.—Mr.— Grantley. You make a good picture of it and I'll give you fifty guineas."

He flushed, and looked pained.

"Less than half would pay me well, sir," he said.

"Tut, tut! stuff, man! Elden told me you were very poor and hard up.

You always will be if you are not more of a man of business."

"Sir!" he exclaimed, rising and looking at me angrily, "I came here expecting the treatment—"

He stopped short, sank into a chair, covered his face with his hands and sobbed like a child.

"My dear sir—I really—I—I didn't mean—" I stammered, perspiring at every pore, for the position was most painful.

"No, no," he said, hastily. "I beg your pardon. But—but," he continued, striving manfully to master his emotion,

"I have been very ill, sir, and I am weak. I have been unfortunate—almost starving at times. I have not broken bread since yesterday morning—I could not without seeing my colors. I—I am much obliged—forgive me—let me go back to town. Oh, my God! has it come to this?"

He sank back, half fainting, but started as I roared out: "Go away!"

For Cobweb was coming into the room.

"Thank you," he said, taking my hand as he saw what I had done. "It was kind of you."

"My dear fellow," I said, "this is terrible!" and I mopped my face.

"There, sit still—back directly."

I ran out to find Cobweb in the hall.

"Oh, you dear, good father!" she cried, with tears in her eyes. "What a kind surprise! But is anything wrong?"

"Artist little faint," I said. "Here, the biscuits. Stop away a bit."

I ran back, and made him take some refreshments; and, thus revived, he rose and thanked me.

"What are you going to do?" I said, staring.

"I'm going back to town, sir," he said quietly, but with his lower lip trembling. "I am not fit to undertake the task. I thank you, but it is too late. I am not well."

I looked at him as a business man, and in that brief glance, as in a revelation, I saw the struggles of a poor, proud man of genius, who could not battle with the world. I saw the man who had sold, bit by bit, everything he owned in his struggle for daily bread; and as I looked at him I felt ashamed that I should be so rich, and fat, and well.

"Mr. Grantley," I said, taking his hand, "I am a rough man, and spoiled by bullying people, and having my own way. I beg your pardon for what I have said and am going to say. You came down here, sir, to paint my little girl's portrait, and you are going to point it before you go back to town; and when you do go you are to have fifty guineas in your pocket. Hush! not a word, sir. My old friend Elden told me that you were a gentleman and a man of honor. Tom Elden is never deceived. Now, sir, please come into the dining-room and have some lunch. Not a word, please. If good food won't bring you round, you shall have the doctor; for, as the police say, "you're my prisoner"—but on parole."

He tried to speak, but could not, and turned away.

"All right," I said, "all right," and I fitted him on the shoulder, and walked away to the window for a few minutes, before I turned back to find him more composed.

That afternoon we all three went out into the wood, and I made Cobweb stand as I had seen her on that day.

Grantley was delighted, and insisted upon making a sketch at once; and then the days were on, with the painting progressing slowly, but in a way that was wonder to me, so exquisite was every touch, for the artist's whole soul was in his work.

Those were delightful days, but there was a storm coming. I quite took to the young fellow, though, and by degrees heard from him his whole story—how young and eager, he had, five years before, come to town to improve in his art, and how bitter had been his struggle, till, just before he had encountered my friend Elden, he had been really, literally dying of sickness and want.

It was a happy time, that, for when the painting was over for the morning we gardened, or strolled in the country —our new friend being an accomplished botanist, and a lover of every object he saw. I used to wonder how he learned so much, and found time to paint as well.

I say it was a happy time for the first