A STERLING HEART.

"Clifton!"
"Sir."
"Where were you last night?"
"I was out."
"I am aware of that fact; but where were you?"
"At the theater."
"No entertainment lasts until four o'clock in the morning. Where were you between eleven and that hour?"
"I decline to answer me."
"You will answer me."
"I will not. I am no longer a boy to be bullied and threatened. I am old enough to go my own way without being called to account for every evening that I spend away from home."
"Very well; admit you are no longer a boy; you need no longer be bullied and threatened, as you express it; and you can henceforth go your own way, if you choose. But from this day your allowance stops."
"Stop?"—altogether cried the young man who had been addressed as Clifton, while he started and flushed a vivid crimson.
The above conversation occurred in a handsomely furnished library of an aristocratic up-town mansion in New York city. Everything about the young bespoke abundant wealth and lavish expenditure.

As may be inferred, father and son were the speakers.
The father was a strongly built man of florid complexion, his whole appearance indicating high living and the free use of wines. He would have been handsome but for a superabundance of flesh and color, which naturally gave him a somewhat gross appearance, while his well-shaped head, high brow and keen, intelligent expression proclaimed him a person of more than average ability.
Just now his color was vividly heightened by anger, while his fine dark eyes flashed stern displeasure upon his companion, who stood by the mantel confronting his father with frowning brow and defiant mien.

He was as handsome a young fellow as one would care to see—in this apparently dissipated and dissipated son of his. He was about the same height as his father, although he seemed much taller because of his more muscular and perfectly fitting suit in which he was clad.
He was apparently about twenty-one years of age, dark, with a rich glow on his cheeks that bespoke perfect health, and clear-cut features, which, against the ebony mantle, seemed like a finely-chiseled cameo. His eyes were a dark, beautiful brown, very like his father's, and his hair, too, at this moment blazing with anger. His hair was of the hue of a chestnut when fully ripe, and, being closely combed, his well-developed head showed to good advantage.

It was not a pleasant sight to see father and son thus facing each other with such passionate antagonism. It betrayed a want of sympathy between them, and a stubbornness on the part of both which made fair to end in open rupture, when there should have been only friendliness and good-will. It showed that there had been a lack of good government—a constant clashing and friction instead of a parental wisdom and tenderness that would have commanded filial love and respect.

This young man showed certain evidences of dissipation, but he feared his father; but he was really more to blame for this state of affairs than Clifton himself, for while Clifton had been absorbed in his Wall street speculations, and his wife occupied in the many pleasures of her fashionable life, this boy, like many other sons of rich men, had drifted into bad company and dangerous habits. His father had never been the companion of him; he had taken no pains to cultivate habits of thrift and industry in him; and now, all too late, he was beginning to regret his mistakes, while he was foolishly adding to them by harsh words of censure and threats of disinheritance, which only served to embitter Clifton still more, and to confirm him in his obstinacy.

"Stop my allowance, did you say?" the young man repeated, with compressed lips, after a few moments of ominous silence on the part of each.
"I did, sir," was the stern response.
"You must turn over a new leaf. Not another dollar of my money will you get to spend until you confess where you were last night, and promise me that you will cut Will Leighton for good and all. More than this, you will give up your club."
"Give up my club?" cried the young man, a dangerous sparkle in his handsome eyes.

"Yes; it is composed of a set of fast, mischievous fellows who are not fit company for you."
"Give up my club?" Clifton repeated, with a sneer. "Really, father, aren't you requiring a good deal, considering the example you have set me all your life? You'd better give up your own practice what you preach, before you demand from privileges that you have always enjoyed. I have only been following in the footsteps of my illustrious parent."

Mr. Vining flushed hotly, but for once he had the wisdom to repress his anger at his son's offensive remarks, and after a moment of thought he replied more calmly than he had yet spoken:
"Clifton, you know that the club and the organization with which you have allied yourself are not to be named in the same breath. If you were associated with a body of respectable men it would be altogether different. If you will resign and unite with some respectable club I will find no fault."

"Can't do it, sir," was the curt and rather defiant reply.
"Then, sir, you have gone the length of your rope. I said before, your income ceases, and you may henceforth look out for yourself."

Clifton turned deadly white at these last words, while a lurid light sprang into his eyes.
Threats, evidently, were not what this son of the Vining family needed just at this time, and it was a pity that his father could not have realized the fact and treated him more as an equal and less like a fractious child.

"I have not a dollar in my pocket," he said, with compressed lips and lowering brow.

"The more shame to you, then; for surely I have not stinted you," said Mr. Vining, severely.

"Hang it, father, I know it; but I have got into debt."

"You have no right to get into debt. What kind of a business man do you expect to make, if you go on at this rate?" demanded his father, with a frown.

"A business man!" sneered Clifton. "What chance have I ever had to make a business man? I said before, I went into the office two years ago, but you would not listen to my request."

"Of course not; your education was not completed at that time. You can have a chance there now if you like, however. I should be highly gratified to have you show a desire to make something of yourself. I'll make a place for you tomorrow, if you'll take it, only I must be obeyed in the matter I have mentioned."

Why could not the man have left well enough alone and ignored, for the time, this boisterous contest?

He might have carried his point, if he had been wiser and used a little finesse, and instead of interest in some worthy object, and betrayed at least some sympathy with him. As it was, however, this stern adherence to the contested question of obedience only served to render him more unmanageable.

"Father, I declare I will not be treated like a child," he exclaimed, with passionate vehemence, and flushing hotly. "I am a man grown—in my twenty-second year; you had better beware of threatening me all my life, and I will not stand it any longer. Give up your own club—set me a virtuous example—and then, perhaps, I'll think of leaving mine."

"You are very disrespectful, sir," haughtily responded his father, while he colored angrily.

"Compromise is fair play," retorted the undutiful son, with a smile of derision.

"Clifton, you are an ungrateful scamp," cried Mr. Vining, hotly.

"And you are certainly a bright example of most kind and adequate father," was the mocking response.

"Have a care, young man!" thundered Mr. Vining.

But Clifton had become reckless, and when on, regardless of consequences.

"Since we are at this game of pith and toss we may as well make it a rough matter of it," he said. "If you had reared me differently we should not now be quarreling like a couple of fighting dogs; but, as a child, you always held me at arm's length; you were arbitrary and autocratic in everything you did; and necessary to good government to make your authority felt, without realizing how a boy may crave the sympathy and companionship of his father. True, you gave me everything that money could buy, but you never gave me either your confidence or affection—at least, if you have experienced the love of a parent for his children, you have never betrayed it to me."

"What do you mean to imply by the emphasis you place upon that pronoun?" Mr. Vining questioned, with some emotion.

How Catarrh is Cured in Maine.
People in Maine are not slow, for if Catarrh has a good thing to say, it comes to Canada for it. This is why Mrs. Jane Tweedle, of Jay Bridge, Maine, has sent for sixteen Catarrhizone Outlets for friends in her locality. This lady gives very full particulars why she did so. Her daughter had doctored for Catarrh, but the remedies used proved quite unavailing, and no relief was obtained. Fortunately a kind neighbor strongly recommended Catarrhizone, and instead of despairing, as she had good reason for doing, she sent for Catarrhizone and used it. Before the first bottle was finished, Mrs. Tweedle states, her daughter was entirely cured. No wonder she recommended it. The child had droppings in the throat, cough, hawking and nausea, and could not sleep at night. There was every indication that consumption would develop if the Catarrh condition was not rectified, and adds that every Catarrh victim should use Catarrhizone to get cured. Druggists sell it, and we guarantee every complete dollar outfit to cure, or your money back. Small size, 10c. A. C. McCallum & Co., Kingston, Canada, or Hartford, Conn., U. S.

For the week ending February 2 the annual rate of mortality in 33 of the largest English cities was as low as 16.4.

Test of Merit.

If the test of merit is the length of time a proprietary medicine remains a seller, then BURDOCK BLOOD BITTERS is a record breaker. It has now been over twenty years on the market and stands out prominently as one of the biggest sellers to-day. In all that time you can count on one hand all the ($$) dollar preparations that have sold over 100,000 bottles in any one year.

B. B. B. is one of them, and still stands in the first rank, not only as a seller, but in the estimation of those who have used it as a family medicine for the cure of boils, pimples, dyspepsia, constipation and bad blood. Its healing, cleansing and purifying properties manifest themselves in curing all blood and skin diseases from a common pimple to the worst scrofulous sore.

Testimony from one who has used it: October 22, 1900.

Mrs. PRICE, Hamilton, Ont., says: "About three months ago I was covered with pimples, was very nervous, and had dizzy spells several times a day. I took three bottles of BURDOCK BLOOD BITTERS and it completely cured me. I now recommend it to all my friends."

THE WORLD OF SPORTS.

Opening of the American League Baseball Season—Race for Big Money Arranged—Various Other Sporting Events.

LACROSSE.

LONDON'S CLUB.

There was an enthusiastic turnout at Wednesday night's meeting of the London lacrosse club, held at Teumessen House, and those present seemed confident of the success of the organization. Officers for the year were elected as follows:

Patrons—C. S. Hyman, M. P.; Major F. B. Leys, M. P.; P. Thomas Robinson, M. P.; Mayor F. G. Rumball, Messrs. T. H. Carling, Adam Beck, Francis Love and R. C. Struthers.

President—A. J. Tume. Vice-President—Charles Christie. Secretary—Wm. Robinson. Executive—Thomas Pinkney, John Coulson, Geo. Gibbons, E. Smith, James Eagan and C. E. Reid.

Hearty votes of thanks were passed to the retiring officers. The report for the last year showed a balance on the strong side of the ledger, owing to heavy expenses incurred in launching the team and purchasing a complete new outfit. The boys will make an active effort to have everything put in ship shape, and intend before the snow is off the ground to have all accounts settled in full and start the new year with a clean sheet.

It was decided to sell a membership card at the rate of $1. The question of sending delegates to the C. L. A. convention was discussed and left to the executive. An effort will be made to get London included in the district league, owing to the fact that the club has been playing at Stratford, St. Marys and possibly Chatham. It was decided to enter the team in the intermediate series.

BASEBALL.

Two games can be played on each of these days. The club would also like to arrange games in American cities for Decoration Day and July 4.

AMERICAN LEAGUE SCHEDULE. The schedule meeting of the American League baseball clubs was held Wednesday night at Philadelphia. The opening day, Memorial Day, and July 4 were agreed upon as follows: April 24, Philadelphia at Washington at Philadelphia, Boston at Baltimore, Cleveland at Chicago, Milwaukee at Detroit, May 30, Memorial Day, Baltimore at Detroit, Philadelphia at Cleveland, Boston at Chicago, Washington at Milwaukee, July 4, Washington at Philadelphia, Baltimore at Boston, Chicago at Cleveland and Detroit at Milwaukee.
