Military Risourges of Switzerland.—The Swiss Confederacy having determined to defend their neutrality at the point of the bayonet, has called two contingents of the national army into the field: the amount to 60,000 men, and have been organized into five divisions. Few of our readers are aware of the rapidity and economy with which such a measure can be brought into operation; a brief inquiry into the system may prove instructive and interesting. The Swiss cantons do not maintain any standing army nor do their soldiery receive pay or quarters in bursches; neither is there such a practice known amongst them as the ballot, or best of drum by recruiting parties. Every male inhabitant is bound to serve in the ranks, and consequently every descendant of Tell is a soldier; but he does not shoulder his frieleds, unless in the case of public danger impending. When the storm has passed over his head, he returns quietly to his anvil or ploughshare, and stores away his rifle or musket as a household deity. At periods, therefore, when it is deemed expedient to place the military resources of Switzerland on active footing, notice is sent to each canton of the divisien to which it is to furnish its contingent, and each local battation is informed of the name and heal quarters of the regiment which it is to join. The quotas are always at hand, the skeletons constituted, and the several positions designated: hence, though there may not be a single man under arms, ip the course of a few days every efficient militant in the county may be summoned on duty, and found at the post to which his country has called him. On a recent occasion, the Sardinian emigrants having endangered the frontiers which bound to Geneva and the Valois, three buttalions of this force were ordered out, and within two any-four hours every rank and file was under arms. A cheaper and more effective army than this cannot be imagined. The confederation has at this time nearly 70,

Rissing with an Appetite.—A religious sect has recently sprung up in the county of Surry, one of whose tenets is to salure each other at a meeting with a holy kiss. One of the female devotees, a young lady of a thousand charms, happening to encounter a young gentleman, of whom site was enamoured, and gave him a more cordial and loving salute than was quite becoming. The next day she received a message from the high priest of the sect, saying she had been excommunicated for "kissing with an appetite."

A printer, whose talents were but indifferent, turned physician. He was asked the reason of it. "In printing," answered he, "all the faults are exposed to the eye—but in physic they are buried with the patient—and one gets more easily off."
