and then through those old fields to pass Where in our childhood we had played; Flowers gathering in the sunny grass. Or sporting in the shade Oh, then it was a joy to me To go unto my native place,

Where many were most dear to see, To see and to embrace. Now, after many years, I go, A grave and thoughtful man, Many to meet, and few to know. Slow pacing where we ran,

Little I find to love or praise, in haunts that were most dear But wander in a thoughtful maze And nothing see nor hear. The present is not,—in the past

"I have never been deceived."

At these words, it may readily be supposed that more than one voice was heard, calling on the gentleman in black for some proof of the truth of his science. He tried his skill upon several of his associates. The grave documents, from which these details have been obtained, do not inform me whether any of the persons had reason to repent the experiment, or whether more than one pretty traveller did not feel her cheeks redden at the responses which her indiscreet questions might have provoked Tonly know, that no sceptic was left among the company at the ground.

He refused all assent to the general belief. "I affirm," said he, throwing an indescribable glance round upon his hearers, that the agartment is stuck up in legible letters, accommon agitated than mine, few thoughts ought to have left deeper traces than mine, and yet, I defy you, sir, to say who or what I am."

During this speech the gentleman in black kept his eyes fastened upon the strange inter-locutor. Ho seemed to be agitated by a painful emotion, but he kept silence. From all pains of the table he was nowed to really and first may be called for. Every morning, too, the former day's bill of each lodger is a check upon mistakes.

clothed entirely in black, as is the custom. With this he rose with a discontented air, with physicians, advocates, and serons, in most of the cities of Europe.

The conversation turned upon the system of Lavater, and the new doctrines of phrenology. "Lavater," said the gentleman in black, "notwithstanding the charlatanism of his doctrine, made a multitude of observations full of truth and interest." He maintained that the leading circumstances of our life left their deep traces upon the counten-
