NORAH CUSHALEEN

HAUNTED CASTLE.

The factor felt the weight of each box in turn, and the uppermost was decidedly the heaviest. He took a short crowbar from the sleeve of his coat and forced up the lid. With an oath he started to his feet,

'Matt's the matter?' asked Mike,
'Matter,' roared the factor. 'The box is full of nothing but stones.'

'Forgetful now of the pistols, Mike and Pat rushed forward, and sure enough they found it true; the box contained nothing but stones.

O'Brady applied the crowbar, the lids flew open, and there again were stones—nothing but stones.
They looked at each other in blank amazapara.

"The mane blackguard, ejaculated Mike.

"First time I meet him I'll crack his crown wid my alpeen, swore Pat.

"And it wur only stones we carried so far," said Mike, with great indig-

exciting scene, and triumphed over their discomfiture.

CHAPTER IX .- WHICH INTRODUCES MARY KENDAL AND DESCRIBES A DANGEROUS ADVENTURE WHICH BEFEL HER.

'No?'
'No. You make one give such very rude answers, papa; but this kind of question demands the very plainest answer that can be given to it; and so I must say once more—No.'
'And will you be pleased to tell me why, you obstinate incomprehensible in the please of the girl?

"Because I don't like Malvrin Blantire.

He is not at all to my taste; besides, he is what may be termed 'a fast young man.

He races and gambles, and rumour says
he may be accused of still wilder things.

'Oh you degenerate daughter of the house of Kendal. To dislike an Irishman because of the very things which make an Irishman great and glortous.—

To be sure he races and gambles as all young Irish gentlemen should do. And may be he gets into a fight at times—I don't know—I hope he does. As for his tricks with the girls, why he couldn't be an Irishman if he wasn't sweet with them. You stupid puss, you have just enumerated the qualities which should make you like him, for he is the man you are to marry.

"No indeed game, he is just the man

make you like him, and which must make you like him, for he is the man you are to marry.

'No, indeed, pape, he is just the man I will not marry. I do not merely dislike—I absolutely hate him.

'Hate him for racing, gambing, ghiding aid rollicking with the girls.—Pooh, peoh! he only does what all spirited young fellows do, but he'll sober down all right, just like me. I raced and gambied, and fought too, when I was young, and liked nothing better than to dance with the girls; and where will you find a more respectable Irish squire than I am? Hey, tell me that.'

'Nowhere, indeed, I am sure. But I am quite certain, papa, that when you were young you were not a bit like Mal vrin Blantie. You must have had a true warm, open, heart, and full of genuine Irish good hamour.'

'Or costse I had, and so has Maleria.'

warm, open heart, and full of genume Irish good humour.

Of coarse I had, and so has Malvrin.

Irish good humour.

Of costse I had, and so has Malvrin, 'I do not think so—I have had a bad opinion both of his principles and his disposition. I am a very good reader of the countenance, papa, and there is that in the face of Malvrin, though he may studiously try to high it, which tells me he is anything but amiable and good.

'For shame, Mary Kendal, to take away a man's character because his looks don't at times happen to please you.—God help us all, if our hearts were to be judged by our faces. But we needn't bother one another by any arguments about it. You are a romantic, young girl, like what most young girls are, I suppose, and, of course, you can't help. it. But I must take care that your youthful romance doesn't spoil you for fife. You are my only child—the last of the house of Kendal—and the honour and glory of the family rests on your marriage; for your second son, if, you have two, as please God I hope you will, will be the heir to Kendal Castle. Now, Malvrin Blantfre is the only man in the district whose station makes him it for my sensinelaw and your husband. He wants you to lie his wife, and there is not a bit of reason why you shouldn't, I have told him as much, and I expect him here to night to have a little more conversation on the same matter.

*But, papa, you would not vicek my happiness? You would not vicek my happiness?

The pacies in this conversation were Squire Kendal and his 'daughter Mary, and the sentiments attered by each indicate pretty plainly their separate characters.

trict, the squire warmly entertained the idea of union between the youth and his daughter Mary. When the latter intimated her dislike to Malvria, he consided it no more than a romantic youthful impression which would be no serious hindrance to the alliance. He therefore listened to her objections with great good humour, and looked upon the mariage as a settled affair.

Ay, and you may thank me that you did not carry them as far again,' said O'Brady. But we have all been duped, and the sconer we get back to Dundarra the better.'

So they took their departure, muttering oaths as they went, and left the box es lying on the ground.

The three watchers had looked on the exciting scene, and friumphed over their exciting scene, and friumphed over their scenes. Second of the Preston Museral Baths.
