CHAPTER XX.
All, however, seemed secure. No sound of footsteps reached his ear—no dark form could be descried moving in the distance. He therefore boldly quitted the shelter of the trees which lined the brow of the slope, and took his way in the direction of the park.

It was not without some bitter sensations that he went skulking along like a guilty thing—moving in that cautious, stealthy way which they only practice who are intent on some unworthy or criminal enterprise. His open, manly nature revolted from the necessity which compelled him to adopt the motions of a culprit, and he felt more than ever incensed against the man whose pride and passion placed him in such a position. But these stern feelings were soon swallowed up by thoughts of Lillias, whose dear form he expected soon to behold.

It wanted nearly an hour to the time appointed when he drew near to the arboreal. Of course, Lillias was not there, and utter silence reigned around.

He entered and set down on the rustic seat. Oh, how vividly did he then recall the scene with Lillias before the Captain came and broke so violently on their dream of bliss. He dwelt on every word, every look, every passionate sob, every affection-breathing sigh, till the sad and happy reflections made the solitude insupportable, and he went forth to meet Lillias on her way.

He had reached the end of the clump of trees, where he had a view of a large open space of the park in the direction of the mansion-house, and as he stood there hesitating whether it might be prudent for him to advance, he was startled to see two forms emerge from under the trees on the other side of the open space, and come slowly forward in his direction.

His first thought was that it was Captain Gibson and Nathan Garrett, and the necessity of flight flashed upon him. But as he continued to gaze, the appearance of the forms slowly dissipated this first idea. They were too slender and too close together to be the Captain and the factor. He waited therefore, and steadily gazed as they came near, and soon he discerned that one of them was a female, that the arm of her companion was passed round her waist, and that as they moved slowly forward they were engaged in earnest and absorbing conversation.

"One of the servants and her lover," thought George, "and coming towards the arboreal too. How unfortunate. This will prevent our meeting there. What is to be done?"

Uncertain how to act, George was on the point of withdrawing into a clump of trees, when the idea struck him that the form of the female had a resemblance to Lillias herself. He gazed again—first under the conviction that this must be a mistake, for how would she be there with a companion, that companion a young man, and with his arm round her? No—no, it could not be Lillias, and yet—good heaven—the nearer they came the greater the resemblance grew. It was no mistake, it was Lillias, and she clung to her companion's arm with a gesture of fondest affection.

Horror of horrors, they pause—he bends towards her; she lifts her face to his, and they kiss each other.

With a hollow groan, George staggered back against the wire fence, and incapable of motion, he stood there waiting their coming.

The Zulus of South Africa are evidently a wide-awake people. They are not entirely ignorant of "corners," "a la Wall street. The Zulus are strongly matrimonial in their tendencies, and get as many wives as they have means to purchase; and unlike many in civilized countries, they buy not with gold, or houses, or estates, but with cows. Twenty thirty, fifty or a hundred cows are given for a wife, according as the girl is young, beautiful, or otherwise. One bold Zulu operator with large capital once bought up all the young and desirable girls in the market of the whole region and compelled all who wanted to buy to pay him most exorbitant prices for wives. Of course there was much distress, and this disastrous state of things attracted the attention of their government, and the recurrence of it was prevented by a law which fixes the legal price of a wife to be only ten cows. No man can collect more than this by law. He may receive fifty if he will, but he can force no man to pay more than ten.

After the first of November no French citizen will be permitted to enter Germany without a passport.

By the accidental flooding of a coal mine near Wrexham, Wales, five hundred miners have been thrown out of employment.
